DALTON v. ANGUS & CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Selborne, L.C., Lord Penzance, Lord Coleridge, Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson), November 13, 14, 17, 1879, November 18, 19, 22, 23, 1880, March 17, June 14, 1881]

[Reported 6 App. Cas. 740; 50 L.J.Q.B. 689; 44 L.T. 844;
46 J.P. 132; 30 W.R. 191]

Easement—Support—Adjoining land—Right to support for building—Twenty years' enjoyment of support.

A right to lateral support from adjoining land is properly called an easement and can be acquired by twenty or more years' uninterrupted enjoyment, nec vi, nec clam, nor by consent or agreement, for a building proved to have been erected at the commencement of that time. It is an easement, not purely negative, capable of being granted and also of being interrupted, and so it falls within s. 2 of the Prescription Act, 1832.

Per LORD BLACKBURN: The right is, I think, more properly described as a right of property, which the owner of the adjoining land is bound to respect, than as an easement, or a servitude ne facias, putting a restriction on the mode in which the neighbour is to use his land, but whether it is to be called by one name or the other is, I think, more a question as to words than as to things.

Negligence—Contractor—Liability of employer for contractor's negligence—Duty of employer to see work properly done—Work contracted for necessarily attended with risk.

Per LORD WATSON: When an employer contracts for the performance of work which, properly conducted, can occasion no risk to his neighbour's house which he is under obligation to support, he is not liable for damage arising from the negligence of the contractor. But in cases where the work is necessarily attended with risk he cannot free himself from liability by binding the contractor to take effectual precautions. He is bound, as in a question with the party injured, to see that the contract is performed, and is, therefore, liable as well as the contractor, to repair any damage which may be done.

Appeals by the defendants in the actions from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON and THESIGER, L.JJ., BRETT, L.J., dissenting), reported 4 Q.B.D. 162, reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (COCKBURN, C.J., and MELLOR, J., LUSH, J., dissenting), reported 3 Q.B.D. 85.

G Two dwelling-houses had stood for many years side by side at Newcastle, each having lateral support from the soil on which the other rested. One of these was the property of the respondents, Angus & Co., and, in 1849, they converted it into a coach factory. The effect of these alterations was to throw more lateral pressure on the soil under the adjoining house. In 1876 the appellant commissioners became possessed of the adjoining house, and proceeded to pull it down and make excavations on the site, preparatory to erecting a new building. The appellant Dalton was the contractor employed by them in the work, and he employed a sub-contractor for the excavations. Sufficient support was not left for the respondents' building, and it fell. There was no evidence of negligence in the excavations.

H Actions were then brought by the respondents, Angus & Co., against the appellant commissioners and the appellant Dalton, to recover damages for the injury done to the coach factory. The actions were tried before LUSH, J., at the Newcastle Summer Assizes in 1876, when the learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the respondents for the damages claimed, subject to a reference as to the amount, without leaving any question to the jury, and extended the time for the respondents to move for judgment. The respondents moved accordingly, but the Queen's Bench Division directed judgment to be entered for the appellants. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

Nov. 13, 14, 17, 1879.—The appeal came on for hearing in the House of Lords, A but after hearing arguments their Lordships directed that it should stand over until the judges could be present. The judges were accordingly summoned, and POLLOCK, B., FIELD, LINDLEY, MANISTY, LOPES, FRY and BOWEN, JJ., attended.

Sir John Holker, Q.C., Shield and A. E. Galhorne Hardy for the appellants commissioners.

Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., and Wheeler for the appellant Dalton. B

Littler, Q.C., Gainsford Bruce and E. Ridley for the respondents, plaintiffs in the actions.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C., put the following questions of law to the learned judges: (i) Has the owner of an ancient building a right of action C against the owner of land adjoining if the latter disturbs his land so as to take away the lateral support previously afforded by such land?; (ii) Is the period during which the plaintiffs' house has stood under the circumstances stated in the case sufficient to give them the same right as if their house was ancient?; (iii) If the act done by the defendants would have caused no damage to the plaintiffs' building as it stood before the alterations made in 1849, is it necessary to prove that the defendants or their predecessors in title had knowledge or notice of these D alterations in order to make the damage done by their agent in removing the lateral support after the lapse of twenty-seven years an actionable wrong?; (iv) If so, is it sufficient to prove knowledge or notice of the fact that such alterations were made, or is it necessary also to prove knowledge of their effect in causing the buildings so altered to require a degree of lateral support from the adjoining land which was not before needed?; (v) Was the course taken by the learned judge at the trial E of directing a verdict for the plaintiffs correct, or ought he to have left any question to the jury?

Mar. 17, 1881.—The judges delivered their opinions on the questions of law propounded to them.

June 14, 1881.—The following opinions were read. F

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—The questions upon these appeals may be reduced to two—the first, whether a right to lateral support from adjoining land can be acquired by twenty-seven years' uninterrupted enjoyment for a building proved to have been newly erected at the commencement of that time; the second, whether, if so, there was anything in the circumstances of this case sufficient either to disprove the acquisition of such right or to make it dependent upon some question of G fact which ought to have been submitted to the jury. There was another point, made by both the petitions of appeal, which I only mention lest it should appear to have been overlooked. The action was brought by reason of the falling of the plaintiffs' house through the excavation of the adjoining land of the commissioners in the course of certain works executed for them by the appellant Dalton under a contract, and for Dalton by sub-contractors. The commissioners disputed their liability H for the acts of Dalton, and Dalton disputed his liability for the acts of his sub-contractors. The same point arose under very similar circumstances in Bower v. Peate (1), and was decided adversely to the contention of the appellants. It follows from that decision (as to the correctness of which I agree with both the courts below), that, if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all they are entitled to recover I against both the commissioners and Dalton.

I proceed to consider the principal question in the case. In the natural state of land, one part of it receives support from another—upper from lower strata, and soil from adjacent soil. This support is natural and is necessary as long as the status quo of the land is maintained; and, therefore, if one parcel of land be conveyed so as to be divided in point of title from another contiguous to it or (as in the case of mines) below it, the status quo of support passes with the property in the land, not as an easement held by a distinct title, but as an incident to the

A land itself sine quo res ipsa haberi non debet. All existing divisions of property in land must have been attended with this incident when not excluded by contract; and it is for that reason often spoken of as a right by law; a right of the owner to the enjoyment of his own property, as distinguished from an easement supposed to be gained by grant; a right for injury to which an adjoining proprietor is responsible, upon the principle sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas. This is all that I understand to be meant by those passages of the judgments in Humphries v. Brogden (2), Rowbotham v. Wilson (3), and Bonomi v. Backhouse (4), to which some of the learned judges referred. In these cases, or in some of them, there were buildings upon the land; but no separate question was raised as to the support necessary for the buildings, as distinguished from that necessary for the land; and the doctrine laid down must, in my opinion, be understood of land without reference to buildings.

C Support to that which is artificially imposed upon land cannot exist ex jure naturæ, because the thing supported itself does not so exist; it must in each particular case be acquired by grant, or by some means equivalent in law to grant, in order to make it a burden upon the neighbour's land, which, naturally, would be free from it. This distinction (and at the same time, its proper limit) was pointed out by WILLES, J., in Bonomi v. Backhouse (4) (E.B. & E. at p. 655). Land which affords support to land is affected by the superincumbent or lateral weight, as by an easement or servitude; the owner is restricted in the use of his own property in precisely the same way as when he has granted a right of support to buildings. The right, therefore, in my opinion, is properly called an easement, as it was by LORD CAMPBELL in Humphries v. Brogden (2); though when the land is in its natural state the easement is natural, and not conventional. The same distinction exists as to rights in respect of running water—the easement of the riparian land-owner is natural; that of the millowner on the stream, so far as it exceeds that of an ordinary riparian proprietor, is conventional—i.e., it must be established by prescription or grant.

F If at the time of the severance of the land from that of the adjoining proprietor it was not in its original state, but had buildings standing on it up to the dividing line, or if it were conveyed expressly with a view to the erection of such buildings, or to any other use of it which might render increased support necessary, there would then be an implied grant of such support as the actual state, or the contemplated use of the land would require, and the artificial would be inseparable from, and (as between the parties to the contract) would be a mere enlargement of, the natural. If a building is divided into floors or "flats," separately owned, the owner of each upper floor or "flat" is entitled, upon the same principle, to vertical support from the lower part of the building, and to the benefit of such lateral support as may be of right enjoyed by the building itself: Caledonian Rail. Co. v. Sprot (5). I think it clear that any such right of support to a building, or part of a building, is an easement; and I agree with LINDLEY and BOWEN, JJ., that it is both scientifically and practically inaccurate to describe it as one of a merely negative kind.

H What is support? The force of gravity causes the superincumbent land or building to press downward upon what is below it, whether artificial or natural; and it has also a tendency to thrust upwards, laterally, any loose or yielding substance, such as earth or clay, until it meets with adequate resistance. Using the language of the law of easements, I say that, in case alike of vertical and of lateral support, both to land and to buildings, the dominant tenement imposes upon the servient a positive and a constant burden, the sustenance of which by the servient tenement is necessary for the safety and stability of the dominant. It is true that the benefit to the dominant tenement arises, not from its own pressure upon the servient tenement, but from the power of the servient tenement to resist that pressure and from its actual sustenance of the burden so imposed. But the burden and its sustenance are reciprocal and inseparable from each other, and it can make no difference whether the dominant tenement is said to impose, or the servient to sustain, the weight.

ferendi applied in the law of Scotland to a house divided into "flats" belonging to different owners, as apt to illustrate the general law of vertical support. The servitude, so denominated (ut vicinus onera vicini sustineat), in the Roman law, was exclusively "urban," that is, relative to buildings, whether in town or country; and the instances of it given in the DIGEST refer to rights of support acquired by one proprietor for his building, or part of it, upon walls belonging to an adjoining proprietor: Inst. lib. 2, tit. 3; Dig. lib. 8, tit. 2, ss. 24, 25, 33 and tit. 5, ss. 6, 8. B
 But, in principle, the nature of such a servitude must be the same, whether it is claimed against a building on which another structure may wholly or partly rest, or against land from which lateral or vertical support is necessary for the safety and stability of that structure.

These principles go far, in my opinion, to establish, as a necessary consequence, C that such a right of support may be gained by prescription. Some of the learned judges appear to think otherwise, and to doubt whether it could be the subject of grant. For that doubt I am unable to perceive any sufficient foundation. LITTLE-DALE, J., in Moore v. Rawson (6), spoke of the right to light as being properly the subject, not of grant, but of covenant. If he had said that a right to light could not be granted, in the sense of the word "grant" necessary for prescription, I D should have doubted the correctness of the opinion, notwithstanding the great learning of that eminent judge. Although the general access of light from the heavens to the earth is indefinite, the light which enters a building by particular apertures does and must pass over the adjoining land in a course which, though not visibly defined, is really certain and, in that sense, definite. Why should it be impossible for the owner of the adjoining land to grant a right of unobstructed E passage over it for that light in that course? The term "ancient" light seems to me itself to imply that such a right might be acquired by prescription. But, however this may be, the opinion of LITTLEDALE, J., is stated by him in words which (unless I misunderstand the true nature of support) do not apply to that easement.
 The pressure of the dominant tenement, in the case of support, is upon the soil of another man's land, and I can see no material difference between this and "some- F thing positive done or used in the soil of another man's land."

WILES, J., in Bonomi v. Backhouse (4), when delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, said that "the right to support of buildings," not only might, but "must be founded upon prescription or grant, expressed or implied." BRAMWELL, B., in Rowbotham v. Wilson (3), said (8
 E. & B. at p. 147): G

"I am of opinion that it is competent to the owner of land, on or after the severance of the mines, to grant to the grantee of the mines the right to damage the surface. I cannot see how, if there may be a grant of mines and of the right to enter, sink shafts, and work, there may not be such a grant as that contended for here [i.e., the right to take away support from the surface].
 Nor can I see how, if a grant of unobstructed light and air, or of support of the soil, to an adjoining owner, would be good, a grant of such a right as claimed here would not be. My brother HAYES said presumed grants of windows and support were idle fictions, and ought never to have been invented; perhaps so, but the fact that they were shows that the inventors and everybody else supposed that real grants of such a nature would be good."

The rule as to prescription is thus stated in SIR FRANCIS NORTH's argument in Potter v. North (7) (1 Vent. at p. 387): I

"The law allows prescription, but in supply of the loss of a grant. Ancient grants happen to be lost many times, and it would be hard that no title could be made to things that lie in grant but by showing of a grant: therefore, upon usage temps dont, etc., the law presumes a grant and a lawful beginning, and allows such usage for a good title; but still it is but in supply of the loss of a grant, and, therefore, for such things as can have no lawful beginning nor be

A created at this day by any manner of grant, or reservation, or deed that can be supposed, no prescription is good."

ASHHURST, J., in Lord Pelham v. Pickersgill (8) (1 Term Rep. at p. 667), laid it down as the general rule that

B "every prescription is good, if by any possibility it can be supposed to have had a legal commencement."

Be the theory what it may, its true foundation, in point of fact, is that which the Romans called usucapio, under the conditions defined by SIR EDWARD COKE (1 Inst. 1136):

C "Both to customs and prescriptions these two things are incidents inseparable—viz., possession or usage, and time. Possession must have three qualities—it must be long, continual, and peaceable, for it is said, transferuntur dominia, sine titulo et traditione, per usucapionem, scilicet per longam, continuam, et pacificam possessionem. Longa—i.e., per spatium temporis per legem definitum. . . . Continuam dico, ita quod not sit legitime interrupta. Pacificam dico, quia si contentiosa fuerit, idem erit quod prius, si contentio fuerit justa. . . .
D Longus usus, nec per vim, nec clam, nec precario."

All these conditions are capable, in my judgment, of being fulfilled as to the right of support to buildings, and, when they are fulfilled, I am unable to understand why the right should not be held to be prescriptively established. The policy and purpose of the law on which both prescription and the presumptions which
E have supplied its place when length of possession has been less than immemorial rest would be defeated, or rendered very insecure, if exceptions to it were admitted on such grounds as that a particular servitude (capable of a lawful origin) is negative rather than positive, or that the inchoate enjoyment of it, before it has matured into a right, is not an actionable wrong, or that resistance to or interruption of it may not be conveniently practicable. I assume, for the present
F purpose, that a man who places on his own land, where it adjoins that of his neighbour, a weight which increases its pressure upon his neighbour's land, is not thereby guilty of an actionable wrong. If this be so, the reason probably is that the act is lawfully done upon his own land, and that the owner of the adjoining land suffers no actual or appreciable damage from the increased amount of pressure which it has to bear, except so far as the continuance of that pressure, if uninterrupted, may tend to ripen into a right, and so to enlarge the servitude to which
G his land was previously subject.

But against this he has his own remedy, if he chooses to prevent and interrupt it. That power of resistance by interruption does, and must in all such cases, exist, otherwise no question like the present would arise. It is true that in some cases (of which the present is an example), a man acting with a reasonable regard
H to his own interest would never exercise it for the mere purpose of preventing his neighbour from enlarging or extending such a servitude. But, on the other hand, it would not be reasonably consistent with the policy of the law in favour of possessory titles that they should depend in each particular case upon the greater or less facility or difficulty, convenience or inconvenience, of practically interrupting them. They can always be interrupted (and that without difficulty or inconvenience)
I when a man wishes and finds it for his interest to make such a use of his own land as will have that effect. So long as it does not suit his purpose or his interest to do this, the law which allows a servitude to be established or enlarged by long and open enjoyment, against one whose preponderating interest it has been to be passive during the whole time necessary for its acquisition, seems more reasonable and more consistent with public convenience and natural equity, than one which would enable him, at any distance of time (whenever his views of his own interest may have undergone a change), to destroy the fruits of his neighbour's diligence, industry, and expenditure.

The law of ancient lights, as it stood before the Prescription Act, 1832, was a stronger example of the application of these principles, the easement in that case being more purely negative. I cannot agree with those who think that law too exceptional and anomalous to furnish an analogy, or exemplify a principle, applicable to any other case. The servitude non altius tollendi, ne luminibus officiat, was as well known to the Roman jurisprudence as the servitude oneris ferendi, or any other; and, if natural, and not only technical, reasons are to be regarded, it is difficult to conceive anything more needful for the comfort of life and enjoyment of house property than the unobstructed enjoyment of light. There is no actionable wrong done by opening new lights which overlook a neighbour's land; and to obstruct them, by building or erecting hoards on that land, when there is no other motive for doing so than to prevent them from ripening into an easement, is as seldom likely to be conveniently practicable as the obstruction of the vertical or lateral support of buildings by excavation or otherwise. But these have not been regarded as sufficient reasons why the right to lights should not be gained by an enjoyment and user for more than twenty years.

From the view which I take of the nature of the right of support, that it is an easement, not purely negative, capable of being granted, and also capable of being interrupted, it seems to me to follow that it must be within s. 2 of the Prescription Act, 1832, unless that section is confined (as ERLE, C.J., in Webb v. Bird (9) appears to have thought) to rights of way and rights of water. The opinion to that effect, expressed by that eminent judge, was not necessary for the decision of Webb v. Bird (9), nor can I perceive that any concurrence in it was expressed by WILLES and BYLES, JJ., who agreed in the decision. The point then determined was that a claim to have free access for all the winds of heaven to the sails of a windmill was too large and indefinite in its nature to be acquired by use or to be capable of interruption, within the meaning of s. 2 of the Prescription Act. That determination I assume to have been correct. But I do not think it possible, without a degree of violence to the express terms of the Act for which neither its context nor its policy (as expressed in the preamble) affords any justification, to restrict the operation of the second section to "the two descriptions of easements therein specified—viz., the right to a way or watercourse." The expressed policy of the Act is large and general; it is to prevent claims of prescription from being defeated by showing a commencement within time of legal memory. Why should not this extend to other easements besides ways and water-rights, and lights, which (by s. 3) are specially provided for, and exceptionally favoured? In terms, s. 2 extends to every claim which could be "lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or the use of any water, to be enjoyed or derived upon, over or from any land or water."

The interjection of the words, "or other easement," between ways and water-courses may seem singular, but I cannot think that they ought, therefore, to be reduced to silence or arbitrarily limited. If any explanation of the place in which they occur is necessary, it may (I think) be found in the separate mention, which follows, of "land" and "water." Reddendo singula singulis, the words (as it seems to me) may be read thus: "any way or other easement to be enjoyed or derived upon, over, or from any land, or any watercourse, or use of water to be enjoyed or derived upon, over, or from any water." So reading them, they would include (unless there is something else in the statute to exclude it, and I find nothing) the easement of support. I am not insensible to the probability that there may be some error in an opinion which seems to be opposed to that of all the learned judges in both the courts below, and of most of those by whom your Lordships have been assisted on this occasion. They did not all advert to the Prescription Act, 1832, but, of those who did, LINDLEY, J., was, I think, the only one who expressed any doubt. The opinion of those learned judges may possibly have been, in some degree, influenced by what was said by so distinguished a judge

- A as ERLE, C.J., in Webb v. Bird (9), which was cited for this purpose by LUSH, J. To those who consider that the right of support was not an easement, or that it was of so purely negative a character as to be incapable of being granted, or of being interrupted within the meaning of the statute, the conclusion that the statute did not apply to it would naturally follow. I have already stated my reasons for not assenting to those premises. The point may, probably, not now require decision;
- B because the same practical conclusion may be reached by your Lordships (as it has been by all the learned judges, except COCKBURN, C.J., MELLOR, J., and BRETT, L.J., by a different road. But, having regard to its possible importance in other cases, I have not thought it right to withhold the expression of the opinion which, after much consideration, I have myself formed upon it.

- C Assuming the statute to apply, what would be its effect? COCKBURN, C.J., thought it would be nugatory. It is undoubtedly true that under s. 2 there is an important difference between a forty years' and a twenty years' user. Forty years' user has the same effect which, under s. 3, twenty years' user has as to light. It makes the right absolute and indefeasible, unless it is shown to have been enjoyed by consent or agreement in writing. But twenty years' user under s. 2 may be defeated "in any other way" in which it was previously—i.e., before
- D Aug. 1, 1832 [the date of the passing of the Prescription Act]—"liable to be defeated," except that it can no longer be defeated or destroyed "by showing only that it was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years." The effect of this, as I understand it, is to apply the law of prescription, properly so called, to an easement enjoyed as of right for twenty years, subject to all defences to which a claim by prescription would previously have been open, except that of
- E showing a commencement within time of legal memory. To allege that there was no evidence from which a grant could be presumed, or that there was evidence from which it ought to be inferred that there was, in fact, no grant, would not, as I understand the law, have been, before Aug. 1, 1832, a competent mode of defeating or destroying any claim to an easement by prescription, and no jury would have been directed to find a grant in any such case, when there was no
- F proof of a commencement within time of legal memory. The section, therefore, assuming it to apply, would, in the present case, be sufficient to establish a title by prescription to the right claimed by the plaintiffs, unless it had been enjoyed vi, or clam, or precario. Of vi, or precario, there is here no question.

- Supposing, however, that s. 2 of the Prescription Act ought not to be held to apply to the easement of support, the same result would practically be reached
- G by the doctrine that a grant, or some lawful title equivalent to it, ought to be presumed after twenty years' user. As to this, I think it unnecessary to say more than that I agree with the view of the authorities taken by LUSH, J., by the majority of the judges in the Court of Appeal, and by all the learned judges who attended this House (unless BOWEN, J., who preferred to rely upon the equitable doctrine of acquiescence, is an exception), in their answers to the first two questions proposed to them by your Lordships.
- H

- Upon the other three questions proposed to the learned judges, which involve the doctrine of clam, as applied to the easement of support, there has been much difference of opinion; four of the learned judges being in the plaintiffs' favour, and the other three thinking that the jury were not properly directed on that point. The inquiry on this part of the case is as to the nature and extent of the know-
- I ledge or means of knowledge which a man ought to be shown to possess, against whom a right of support for another man's building is claimed. He cannot resist or interrupt that of which he is wholly ignorant. But there are some things of which all men ought to be presumed to have knowledge, and among them, I think, is the fact that, according to the laws of nature, a building cannot stand without vertical or (ordinarily) without lateral support. When a new building is openly erected on one side of the dividing line between two properties, its general nature and character, its exterior and much of its interior structure, must be visible and ascertainable by the adjoining proprietor during the course of its erection. When, as in the present case, the interior of a private dwelling-house is entirely altered, and a building of an entirely different character, such as a coach or carriage factory, with a large and massive brick pillar and chimney stack, is erected instead of it, the adjoining proprietor must have imputed to him knowledge that a new and enlarged easement of support (whatever may be its extent) is going to be acquired against him, unless he interrupts or prevents it. The case is, in my opinion, substantially the same as if a new factory had been erected where no building stood before. A

Having this knowledge, it is, in my judgment, by no means necessary that he should have particular information as to those details of the internal structure of the building on which the amount or incidence of its weight may more or less depend. If he thought it material he might inquire into those particulars, and then, if information were improperly withheld from him, or if he received false or misleading information, or if anything could be shown to have been done secretly or surreptitiously, in order to keep material facts from his knowledge, the case would be different. But here there was no evidence from which a jury could have been entitled to infer any of these things. Everything was honestly and (as far as it could be) openly done, without any deception or concealment. The interior construction of the building was, indeed, such as to require lateral support beyond what might have been necessary if it had been otherwise constructed. But this must always be liable to happen whenever a building has to be adapted to a particular use. The knowledge that it may or may not happen is, in my opinion, enough, if the adjoining proprietor makes no inquiry. I think, therefore, that in this case the kind and degree of knowledge which the adjoining proprietor must necessarily have had was sufficient; that nothing was done clam, and that the evidence did not raise any question on this point which ought to have been submitted to the jury. My opinion, therefore, upon the whole case is in favour of the respondents, the plaintiffs in the action, and against the appellants; and the motion which I have to make to your Lordships is that the judgment of the court below be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. C

LORD PENZANCE.—In dealing with the questions of law to which the present case gives rise, it is material to bear in mind that the exact proposition which the appellants call upon your Lordships to repudiate, or affirm, is to be found in the ruling at the trial given by the learned judge. It is in these words: F

“The authorities oblige me to hold, that when a building has stood for twenty years it has acquired a right to the support of the adjacent land, and I do not think that it all depends upon whether the opposite or adjacent neighbour had notice, or not, of what was done, or what weight was put upon it, nor does it rest on the fact of there being an implied grant. I think it has become absolute law, that when a building has stood for twenty years, supported by the adjacent soil, it has acquired a right to the support of the soil; and no one has a right to take all that soil without putting an equivalent to sustain the building. That is the ruling which I must lay down here, because that is upheld by many authorities.” G

Your Lordships have now to say whether this view of the authorities is a correct one; and, with some reluctance, I feel constrained to say that, in my opinion, it is so. I say with some reluctance, not because I think that the support which the plaintiffs claim for their house is unreasonable, or inequitable, but because the circumstances under which the claim is held to arise, are, so far as I am able to discover, incapable of giving rise to it in accordance with any known principle of law. I

It must be borne in mind both what the claim is, and what it is not. It is not a claim asserted for the support of a house by the adjacent soil as soon as that house is built; but a claim that when the house has stood “for twenty years supported by the adjacent soil it has by absolute law acquired a right to the support

A of the soil"; and this not by reason of any implied grant, and quite independently of whether "the opposite or adjacent neighbour had notice or not of what was done or what weight was put upon" the ground to which the lateral support was required.

B It is this sudden starting into existence of a right which did not exist the day before the twenty years expired, without reference to any presumption of acquiescence by the neighbour (to which the lapse of that period of time without interruption on his part might naturally give rise) which I find it impossible to reconcile with legal principles. I find myself, therefore, in entire accord with the opinion which FRY, J., has offered to the House;* and he has so fully and ably illustrated his views on the subject, which are also mine, that I have little to add.

C If this matter were res integra, I think it would not be inconsistent with legal principles to hold that where an owner of land has used his land for an ordinary and reasonable purpose, such as placing a house upon it, the owner of the adjacent soil could not be allowed so to deal with his own soil by excavation as to bring his neighbour's house to the ground. It would be, I think, no unreasonable application of the principle "sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas" to hold, that the owner of the adjacent soil, if desirous of excavating it, should take reasonable precautions by way of shoring, or otherwise, to prevent the excavation from disastrously affecting his neighbour. A burden would, no doubt, be thus cast on one man by the act of another done without his consent. But the advantages of such a rule would be reciprocal, and, regard being had to the practicability of shoring up during excavation, the restriction thus placed on excavation would not seriously impair the rights of ownership.

E But the matter is not res integra. It has been the subject of legal decisions, and those decisions leave it beyond doubt that such is not the law of England. On the contrary it is the law, I believe I may say without question, that at any time within twenty years after the house is built the owner of the adjacent soil may with perfect legality dig that soil away, and allow his neighbour's house, if supported by it, to fall in ruins to the ground. This being so, and these being his legal rights (the rights incident to his ownership), it seems to me that these rights must remain to him, or those who come after him, for all time, unless he, or they, have done something by which these rights have been divested, restricted, or impaired. I find it impossible to conceive, within the application of any legal principles, that mere lapse of time can divest him or them of the rights they once had. Legal rights do not perish by lapse of time, but rather grow confirmed. What I mean to express is that the right to excavate the neighbouring soil not being impaired or restricted by the house being built, anything which afterwards impairs or restricts it must proceed from those who possess that right, and cannot come about, all things remaining unchanged, by the mere efflux of time.

G In all the cases in which lapse of time is held to stand in the way of the assertion of rights attaching to the ownership of property, it is not the lapse of time itself which so operates but the inferences which are reasonably drawn from the continuous existence of a given state of things during that period of time. These inferences are inferences of acquiescence or consent, and they are drawn from the fact that the person against whom the right is claimed has for a length of time failed to interrupt or prevent an enjoyment by his neighbour which he might have interrupted had he so pleased. In Chasemore v. Richards (10) the language held I puts this beyond doubt. WIGHTMAN, J., said that no presumption could be raised from non-interruption unless the person against whom the right is claimed might have prevented it, and LORD WENSLEYDALE, in addressing your Lordships, distinctly relied upon the fact that the defendant was not able to prevent the enjoyment which after a lapse of years had been claimed as a right against him. In the more modern case of Sturges v. Bridgman (11) it was distinctly determined that no easement could be created by lapse of time unless the defendant might have interrupted it. "Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest assentire videtur" is the legal maxim upon which, in my opinion, all the cases of easements of whatever kind acquired by length of time substantially rest. A

The question, therefore, in each particular case must be: Could the defendant have interrupted the enjoyment in question? If these words are taken literally, all cases are alike, and the question is no question at all. For an action for the disturbance of the enjoyment claimed involves the possibility of its being disturbed, and the fact that the defendant has at last interrupted the plaintiff's enjoyment (say of support to his house) which constitutes his cause of action, is a very simple proof, except under special circumstances, that the enjoyment was capable of interruption at an earlier period. The defendant's power of interruption, therefore, in my opinion, means something very different from the mere physical possibility of interrupting. It involves knowledge that the necessity for support existed, and the possibility of withdrawing that support without the expenditure of so much labour or money, or the incurring of so much loss or damage, as a man could not reasonably be expected to incur. B C

There is direct authority for this proposition to be found in Webb v. Bird (9) in which WILLES, J., states the principle which is to be extracted from the previous cases, in the following language (10 C.B.N.S. at p. 285): D

"In general a man cannot establish a right by lapse of time and acquiescence against his neighbour, unless he shows that the party against whom the right is acquired might have brought an action, or done some act, to put a stop to the claim, without an unreasonable waste of labour and expense."

Nor is any other view of this matter, as it seems to me, consistent with the terms in which a right to be gained by prescription or lapse of time is defined. A claim by prescription to a right of this character is said only to arise when a right, or benefit, enjoyed over a length of time has been enjoyed "nec vi, nec clam." What is the meaning and bearing of these qualifications? or what place could they have in such a definition, unless they point to the fact that the benefit claimed after a lapse of years as a right is one, the existence of which the person against whom it is claimed had the means of knowing, and the enjoyment of which he had the power to stop? And of what importance are these matters, except that they lay the foundation, where the right or benefit has not been interfered with, for presuming that he who might have interfered with them, has granted or consented that they should be undisturbed in future? E F

Continuous enjoyment without interruption is surely insisted upon as the basis of the right for some reason, and for what reason except that it is the evidence of assent? The physical power to interrupt, if accompanied, as I have above suggested, by a knowledge that the enjoyment of support existed, and by the means of exercising that power of interruption without extravagant and unreasonable loss or expense, may well give ground for an implied assent if it be not exercised for so long a period as twenty years. But if unaccompanied by these qualifications. H the fact of non-interruption appears to lead to no conclusion whatever, and the restrictions insisted upon, that the enjoyment must be "open" and not sustained by "force," cease to have an intelligent place in the definition. In the present case it is obvious that a power to interrupt is one which, although it has existed, and been physically possible ever since the plaintiffs' house was built, could only be exercised by measures which no man in his senses would take. It would indeed I be an unreasonable state of the law which should enforce upon the defendant, if he wished to retain his original right to excavate his own soil at such time as his interests might require him to do so, that he should pull his own house down, and drag his neighbour's to the ground with it at a time when his interest did not require it, and when it could be nothing but a grievous loss and injury to all parties concerned.

For these reasons I am unable to support the conclusion that a right such as that here in question could be gained by the plaintiffs by anything in the shape of pre-

A scription or lost grant; but, if I am mistaken in this, I think it is clear that in the present case the question should have been submitted to the jury whether the enjoyment of the support to the house was an "open" enjoyment at all. The house was built in an exceptional manner, and that which, seen from the outside, would appear to be nothing more than an ordinary chimney stack carrying nothing but its own weight, was in truth a pier of brickwork, intended to carry, and in fact carrying, one end of an iron girder, upon which girder the whole upper floor of the house rested. If the plaintiffs' right, therefore, was to be established by prescription, I think it inevitable that the matter should have been dealt with by the learned judge in the manner clearly described by LINDLEY, J., in his answer to your Lordships' fifth question.* And I daresay it would have been so dealt with if the learned judge had not considered the plaintiffs' right to stand on a different ground altogether, and asserted it to be an absolute right acquired by twenty years' enjoyment, quite independent of grant, acquiescence, or consent. In so doing he relied, he said, upon the existing authorities. I will not recapitulate them or criticise them individually, as they have been carefully reviewed by others. They constitute the existing law on the subject; and I think the learned judge has drawn what is upon the whole the correct inference from them, though they are by no means uniform, and although, for the reasons I have given, and for those more fully expanded in the opinion of FRY, J.,† I am unable to find a satisfactory legal ground upon which these authorities may be justified. I feel the less difficulty in acquiescing in them, inasmuch as they affirm a right to exist after twenty years, which, in my opinion, should have been held to exist as soon as the plaintiffs' house was built. The learned judge's direction at the trial was, therefore, in my opinion, correct, and this appeal should be dismissed with costs. If I have ventured to question the legal principles upon which the authorities which guided him are founded, I have only done so lest this case should be thought an authority for the establishment of other rights more or less similar to the right here in question. So far as my opinion goes this right, to the lateral support of the soil for an ancient house, stands upon the positive authority of a series of cases and a long acceptance in the courts of law, and the ratification of it by your Lordships ought not to be considered as the adoption of principles which might have a wide application in analogous cases.

* LINDLEY, J.: What is proof of open enjoyment will appear from my answer to the next question. In answer to your Lordships' fifth question, for the reasons stated, I am of opinion that the course taken by the learned judge at the trial in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs was not correct. He ought to have left the jury to decide the question of open enjoyment by the plaintiffs of the right they claimed. In order to make this question intelligible to a jury they should be told that they ought to consider that the plaintiffs had openly enjoyed all that support which any reasonably competent person, seeing the ground and the plaintiffs' building (but knowing of its peculiarities), would infer that it required when used for the purposes for which it was apparently constructed and adapted; but any support which in fact the building might require beyond this ought not to be considered as openly enjoyed, unless the necessity for such additional support was in fact known to the defendants or their predecessors in title. In the great majority of cases the existence and nature of the building will render it unnecessary to investigate such a question as this; for it is only in cases of an unusual character that a building requires more support than any competent person seeing it would suppose. But, in my opinion, the plaintiffs' building in this case was so peculiarly constructed as to render it quite possible for the defendants to prove, first, that the plaintiffs had enjoyed more support than any one would infer from the nature and character of their building; and, secondly, that the building fell by reason of the withdrawal of such extra support, which, although enjoyed in fact, had not been enjoyed openly or to the knowledge of the defendants or their predecessors in title. If the defendants had succeeded in proving these points they would in my judgment have been entitled to a verdict; and it is because they had no opportunity of giving such proof that I think there ought to be a new trial. A direction to the jury to the effect above mentioned would not only be in accordance with law as I understand it, but would also, I think, be free from practical difficulties or objections; for it comes to this, that speaking generally, and excluding cases of settled estates and other anomalous cases, the owner of a house which has existed for twenty years is entitled to such support as any one acquainted with building can see the house requires, but not to more unless he can show actual notice of enjoyment of more.

LORD BLACKBURN.—The first of the defences raised by the pleadings is a denial that the plaintiffs were entitled to have their buildings supported by the land adjacent thereto. It is on this defence that the most difficult questions arise, and I shall consider it first. A

It is, I think, conclusively settled by the decision in this House in Backhouse v. Bonomi (4) that the owner of land has a right to support from the adjoining soil; not a right to have the adjoining soil remain in its natural state (which right, if it existed, would be infringed as soon as any excavation was made in it), but a right to have the benefit of support, which is infringed as soon as, and not till, damage is sustained in consequence of the withdrawal of that support. B

This right is, I think more properly described as a right of property, which the owner of the adjoining land is bound to respect, than as an easement, or a servitude ne facias, putting a restriction on the mode in which the neighbour is to use his land, but whether it is to be called by one name or the other is, I think, more a question as to words than as to things. And this is a right which, in the case of land, is given as of common right; it is not necessary either in pleading to allege, or in evidence to prove, any special origin for it; the burden, both in pleading and in proof, is on those who deny its existence in the particular case. No doubt the right is suspended, or, rather perhaps, cannot be infringed, while the adjoining properties are in the hands of the same owner. He may dig pits on his own land, and suffer his own adjoining land to fall into those pits just as he pleases. When he severs the ownership and conveys a part of the land to another, he gives the person to whom it is conveyed (unless the contrary is expressed) not a right to complain of what has been already done, but a right to have the support in future. It is, I think, now settled that the conveyance may be on such terms as to prevent any such right arising: see Rowbotham v. Wilson (3); Smith v. Darby (12); Eadon v. Jeffcock (13); Aspden v. Seddon (14). But the burden both of pleading and proving such a case lies on those setting it up. And I think that the decision of this House in Backhouse v. Bonomi (4) also conclusively settles that, though the right of support to a building is not of common right and must be acquired, yet, when it is acquired, the right of the owner of the building to support for it is precisely the same as that of the owner of land to support for it. Both LORD CRANWORTH and LORD WENSLEYDALE say that this right also is more properly to be called a right of property to be respected by the owner of the adjoining land than a negative easement or servitude ne facias. LORD WENSLEYDALE could not mean to say that the right of support to a house was of common right, and so overrule several authorities, including Gayford v. Nicholls (15), where he himself had delivered judgment. E F G

In the case now before your Lordships, nothing was proved which could have given rise to this right unless it arose from enjoyment in the manner and subject to the conditions and for the time required by law to give a title by prescription. And inasmuch as it was clearly proved that, though there had been more ancient buildings on the spot, they were removed, and buildings of a different structure and requiring a different degree of support were erected in their place only twenty-seven years before the excavations complained of, it seems to me clear that the buildings are not ancient buildings in the sense that they or similar buildings, for which in the course of repair they were substituted, had stood there from time beyond memory. The plaintiffs must (unless the construction of the Prescription Act, 1832, is such as to embrace such a case as this) rely on the comparatively modern doctrine by which enjoyment of a right appurtenant to land for twenty years or more, under such circumstances as are required by law, is given the effect of prescription, though it is proved that the enjoyment began within living memory. H I

I do not understand COCKBURN, C.J., to doubt that such a right as that now in question might be acquired, according to English law, where the building had stood from time immemorial, by enjoyment open and peaceable from time immemorial. It was questioned on the argument at the Bar of this House, whether a right of support for a building could be acquired by any length of enjoyment, even

A from time immemorial, and I shall consider that later. But the Lord Chief Justice, I think, denied that this right could be acquired by enjoyment for a less time than time immemorial. He said that such enjoyment might give rise to a presumption that there was originally a grant, or at least an assent in point of fact to the enjoyment, but said that when it was proved, or what comes to the same thing, admitted, that the assent of the defendants' predecessors was not asked for, or

B obtained by grant or in any other way, the presumption was at an end. This is expressed in terms confined to this particular right, but I think his position is general, and applies to every easement, unless it is claimed under the Prescription Act, 1832. This requires examination.

The English common law is stated by LORD COKE (Co. Lit. 113b, 114a). He says, to make prescription, two things are incidents inseparable, possession or

C usage, and time. Possession must be long, continual, and peaceable. As to "long," LORD COKE says: "It is the time given by law, which in England is the time whereof there is no memory of man to the contrary." But though living memory might not be to the contrary, yet if written evidence showed that the possession had a beginning, it was defeated. By what COCKBURN, C.J., seems to think a judicial usurpation of legislative power, the time of legal memory was fixed

D to be the same as the limitation of real actions by the Statute of Westminster (1275), viz., the time of Richard I, 1189. This, when first introduced, gave a prescription of about eighty-six years, but being a fixed date, it became longer and longer, and already when LITTLETON wrote, in the reign of Edward IV, he observes on the inconvenience felt, because the time of limitation of a writ of right is of so long time past.

E This inconvenience must have been particularly felt with regard to any rights attached to buildings. For though a few buildings which existed in 1189 still exist, and there are some old cities and towns (not of very great extent) which then existed, and in which it is possible that the ancient buildings have been from time to time repaired without altering their structure, yet far the greater part of the buildings in England stand on land which can be shown to have been first built

F upon at a much later date.

In Bedle v. Beard and Wingfield (16), in 1607, it was held that, though it was proved that there was a time within legal memory when the right claimed had not existed, and, consequently, the right could not have its origin in prescription, long possession was a sufficient ground for presuming what was necessary to make that possession lawful, and, consequently, in that case, where there had been possession for 303 years, for presuming a grant from the Crown, though none was shown.

G LORD COKE said:

"This was resolved by LORD ELLESMERE, with the principal judges, and on consideration of precedents."

So that the doctrine was not then introduced for the first time. But the length of

H time necessary to give rise to such a prescription was left indefinite, and though I think no one, in that case, could have really believed that there actually had been a grant from the Crown which was lost, that is not said, and it may have been thought that long user was evidence by which the fact might be proved, but that it should not be found unless believed. The modern doctrine that a jury ought to be directed that if they believed that there had been what was equivalent to

I adverse possession as of right for more than twenty years, they ought to presume that it originated lawfully, that is, in most cases, by a grant, must certainly have been introduced after the passing of the Limitation Act, 1623, and as the earliest reported decision is that of Lewis v. Price (17), in 1761, the doctrine is probably not much more than a century old. I quite agree with what is said by COCKBURN, C.J. (3 Q.B.D. at p. 105), that where the evidence proved an adverse enjoyment as of right for twenty years, or little more, and nothing else, "no one had the faintest belief that any grant had ever existed, and the presumption was known to be a mere fiction." He thinks that thus to shorten the period of prescription without the authority of the legislature was a great judicial usurpation. Perhaps it was. The same thing may be said of all legal fictions, and was often said (with, I think, more reason) of recoveries. But I take it that when a long series of cases have settled the law, it would produce intolerable confusion if it were to be reversed because the mode in which it was introduced was not approved of: even where it was originally a blunder, and inconvenient, communis error facit jus. But to refuse to administer a long-established law because it was based on a fiction of law, admitted to be for a purpose and producing a result very beneficial, is, as it seems to me, at least as great a usurpation of what is properly the function of the legislature as it was at first to introduce that fiction. A B

It is difficult to reconcile all the dicta and decisions on the subject. There is language used in Darwin v. Upton (18), as to the difference between an absolute bar and a presumptive bar which I have never been able to understand. I quite agree that where the evidence is such as to leave it a question whether the enjoyment has been such—open, peaceable, and continual—as to raise a presumption of the right, the jury must be asked to find as a fact whether the enjoyment was of that kind; but COCKBURN, C.J., seems (3 Q.B.D. at p. 107) to understand Darwin v. Upton (18) as amounting to this, that the jury should be told that, if the enjoyment has been such as to raise a presumption of a right, they may find a grant whether they believe in its existence or not, but that, if they choose to be scrupulous, they need not so find. I cannot believe that the judges meant that, and, if they did, I think the subsequent cases are inconsistent with that ruling. I would more particularly rely on what is said by BAYLEY, J., in Cross v. Lewis (19). The judges never altered the form of pleading, and it was still necessary for a defendant setting up a right as a defence, to plead it with particularity: see Hendy v. Stephen-son (20). C D E

In Campbell v. Wilson (21) the defendant pleaded, first, a way by prescription, which was traversed; and, secondly, that Bryan Grey was seised in fee of the locus in quo, and that Joseph Wilson (under whom the defendant made title by devise) was at the same time seised in fee of an adjoining moss dale, and that by deed, lost by time and accident, Bryan Grey granted a right of way over the locus in quo to Joseph Wilson and his heirs. The replication traversed the grant. At the trial in 1803, before CHAMBRE, J., it appeared that in 1778, by an award made under an Inclosure Act, all ways not set out in the award were extinguished. And this way was not set out in the award. This put an end to the plea of prescription, and it would also have put an end to the second plea, unless the alleged grant by Bryan Grey was made subsequent to the award, that is, within twenty-five years next before the trial, and, of course, within less than that time before the plea was pleaded, in which it was alleged that the deed was lost by time and accident. But evidence was given that there had been, for more than twenty years, an adverse enjoyment of the right of way. If the issue joined was to be understood in its literal and natural sense, it could hardly have been suggested that this was evidence to justify the judge in leaving it to the jury whether, in fact, in the short interval between the making of the award and the commencement of the twenty years' enjoyment, not more than two or at most four years, there actually had been a grant since lost. But so to construe the issue would have made the question whether there was a right to depend on the accident whether the right was set up by a plaintiff complaining of an obstruction to it, or a defendant justifying under it. CHAMBRE, J., who was a very learned pleader, does not seem to have had the least doubt of the meaning of the issue. He never said one word to the jury as to the reality of the grant, but left it to them to presume it, if satisfied that the enjoyment was adverse, and had continued twenty years before the action. This direction was approved of by LORD ELLENBOROUGH and the whole Court of King's Bench, the only question on which they seem to have had any difficulty being whether there was a proper direction given as to the nature of the enjoyment which would give rise to the presumption that the defendant acted by right. And in Penwarden v. Ching (22), where issue was taken on a plea justifying a F G H I

A trespass in defence of an ancient window, and on the trial in 1829 it was proved before TINDAL, C.J., that the window was first erected in 1807, that learned judge said that

B “the question is not whether the window is what is strictly called ancient, but whether it is such as the law, in indulgence to rights, has in modern times so called, and to which the defendant has a right, for this is the substance of the plea.”

The verdict was for the plaintiff, so that this ruling could not be reviewed, but it was the ruling of a judge who was a very learned pleader.

C In both these cases, and in many more, if the question had been whether there really in fact had been a grant or really in fact the window was ancient, there could have been no possible question. It was, no doubt, desirable that such artificial doctrines should be dispensed with. The Prescription Act, 1832, so far as it went, made that a direct bar which was before only a bar by the intervention of a jury and the use of an artificial fiction of law. But it did not abolish the old doctrine; if it had, old rights even from time immemorial would have been put an end to by unity of occupation for the space of a year. But this was not done: D see Aynsley v. Glover (23). I think the law, as far as regards this subject, is the same as it was before that Act was passed. Neither can I agree with what seems thrown out by LUSH, J., rather as a makeweight than as a substantial ground of decision, that the more recent Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, which put an end to the doctrine of adverse possession, has made any difference in the law. This view of the matter renders it unnecessary to decide anything as to the construction E of the Prescription Act, 1832, and I wish to say nothing that may prejudice the decision of that question if hereafter it becomes material.

I scarcely think that, if this had been the only point argued at your Lordships' Bar on the first occasion it would have been thought of sufficient difficulty to ask the opinions of the learned judges. But it is satisfactory to find that they all agree that a building, which has de facto enjoyed (under the circumstances and F conditions required by the law of prescription) support for more than twenty years, has the same right as an ancient house would have had.

I am glad that the recent alterations in the law have obviated the necessity of putting such very artificial constructions on issues as I have mentioned. But I am not able to agree with BOWEN, J., in thinking that the alterations in the modes G of procedure and the fusion of law and equity have made any alteration in the substance of the law. I quite agree with him in thinking that circumstances might, and often did, give rise to an equity to protect a house which would not have given rise to a legal claim to maintain an action at law. But those circumstances must always have existed in fact, and generally there must have been notice of them. I cannot think the alterations in procedure have altered the law.

H On the first argument at the Bar of this House in November, 1879, when the Lords present were the then Lord Chancellor (EARL CAIRNS), LORD PENZANCE, and myself, a very able argument was addressed to this House by the then Attorney-General [SIR JOHN HOLKER], and the present Solicitor-General [SIR FARRER HERSCHELL], and at the close of it the Lord Chancellor summarised the argument, and asked if this was a correct statement of their proposition:

I “In order to gain for the owner of land, by enjoyment, a title to some advantage from or upon his neighbour's adjacent close, greater than would naturally belong to him, the advantage must be one the enjoyment of which is or ought to be known to the neighbour, and could, without destruction or serious injury to his own close, be interrupted by him.”

This was accepted by the Attorney-General as truly representing the argument. As the Prescription Act, 1832, was couched in terms which, as it has been held, prevented its applying to this case, it might be necessary in considering this proposition to decide questions of great importance, which had never yet been finally decided, and, therefore, it was deemed advisable to have the assistance of the learned judges, and a further argument was ordered. A

I do not think anything was said at the second argument that was not involved in the summary of the first argument which I have above quoted. It was admitted that if the proposition was correct, no lapse of time, not even from time immemorial, could give a right of support to a building, such as to oblige the owners of adjoining land to respect it, and that the same would have been before the Prescription Act, 1832, and still was in cases not within its provisions, the law as to the acquisition by enjoyment of the right to require the neighbours to respect the access of light and air to a window, unless it made a difference that the enjoyment in this latter case could be easily interrupted. Reference was made to cases which were said to be analogous, such as that of keeping land undrained, so as to act as a reservoir for springs: Chasemore v. Richards (10); or that of claiming to have uninterrupted the access for the wind to a windmill: Webb v. Bird (9); and it was said that the principle on which those cases were decided was one which showed that there was no right of support acquired by the common law prescription for a building, though it had stood for time immemorial, and, if that was so, there could be none by the prescription for a shorter period created by the modern decisions; for I agree with BRAMWELL, L.J., where, in Bryant v. Lefever (24), he says that what he calls the expedient, introduced by these decisions, is ancillary to the doctrine of prescription at common law, and applicable in cases where something prevents the operation of the common law prescription from time immemorial, and is, therefore, only applicable where the right claimed is such as, if immemorial, might have been the subject of prescription. C D

During the very considerable interval that elapsed between the first argument in November, 1879, and the time when the opinions of the learned judges were delivered, Mar. 15, 1881, I have at intervals bestowed consideration on this proposition, and though I refrained from finally coming to a decision till I had the advantage of considering their opinions, I was strongly impressed with the conviction that such a right as is here claimed, was, according to the established law of England, one which might be acquired by prescription. And I find that all the judges agree in that result, though not entirely for the same reasons, and I am not sure that any of them would have quite assented to the train of reasoning which has led me to that same result. E F

On a minor point—whether there should be a new trial because the judge at the trial left no question to the jury when, as it was said, there was or might have been evidence produced which would raise a question of fact which might have been a defence—the learned judges are divided in opinion; LINDLEY, LOPES, and BOWEN, JJ., agreeing with the majority of the Court of Appeal that there should be a new trial, and POLLOCK, B., FIELD, MANISTY, and FRY, JJ., thinking that there should not. It is not necessary to choose between the divers reasons which led them to the same result on the first point. It may be necessary to do so on this minor point, where their reasons led to different results. I have come to the conclusion that there should not be a new trial. I will state the reasoning which has led me to these conclusions. G H

I cannot agree that the only principle on which enjoyment could give the owner of property a prescriptive right over a neighbour's land exceeding what would, of common right, belong to the owner of that property, was acquiescence on the part of the neighbour. Nor even that it is the chief principle. In general such enlarged rights are of such a nature that those over whose property they are enjoyed could in the beginning have stopped them; and a failure to stop them is evidence of acquiescence, and may afford a ground for finding that there was an actual assent, but that is, in many if not in all cases, a fiction. There is seldom a real assent. But no doubt a failure to interrupt, when there is power to do so, may well be called laches, and it seems far less hard to say that for the public good and for the quieting of titles enjoyment for a prescribed time shall bar the true owner when the true owner has been guilty of laches, than to say that for the public I

A good the true owner shall lose his rights, if he has not exercised them during the prescribed period, whether there has been laches or not; but there is not much hardship. Presumably such rights if not exercised are not of much value, and though sometimes they are "ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur." This ground of acquiescence or laches is often spoken of as if it were the only ground on which prescription was or could be founded. But I think the weight of authority, both in this country and in other systems of jurisprudence, shows that the principle on which prescription is founded is more extensive.

B Prescription is not one of those laws which are derived from natural justice. LORD STAIR, in his INSTITUTIONS, treating of the law of Scotland, in the old customs of which country he tells us prescription had no place (book 2, tit. 2, s. 9), says, I think truly:

C "Prescription, although it be by positive law, founded upon utility more than upon equity, the introduction whereof the Romans ascribed to themselves, yet hath it been since received by most nations, but not so as to be counted amongst the laws of nations, because it is not the same, but different in diverse nations as to the matter, manner, and time of it."

D It was called by the old Roman lawyers usucapio, which is defined (Dig. lib. 41, tit. 3, De usurpationibus et usucapionibus, art. 3) to be "adjectio domini per continuationem possessionis temporis lege definiti." In the same book and title, art. 1, the reason is given:

E "Bono publico usucapio introducta est ne scilicet quarundam rerum diu et fere semper incerta dominia essent, quum sufficeret dominis ad inquirendas res suas statuti temporis spatium."

F This is precisely the object with which modern statutes of limitations are established, and it would be baffled if there was to be a further inquiry whether there had been acquiescence on the part of the true owner. It is both fair and expedient that there should be provisions to enlarge the time when the true owners are under disabilities or for any other reason are not to be considered guilty of laches in not using their right within the specified period, and such provisions there were in the Roman law, and commonly are in modern statutes of limitations, but I take it that these are positive laws, founded on expedience, and varying in different countries and at different times.

G The minor question whether there should be a new trial, in my mind, depends on the question what positive laws have been adopted by the English courts. To return to the Roman law, usucapio, it will be noticed, was confined to the dominium, nearly equivalent to the modern phrase of the legal estate. It was enunciated in the laws of the Twelve Tables, in terms brief, to the extent of being obscure, and simple to the extent of being rude—"Usus auctoritas fundi biennium, cæterarum omnium annuus est usus." This for centuries, down to the time of Justinian, continued to be the law, as far as regarded the dominium, within the old territory of the republic, but side by side with it, the Prætors introduced, by their edicts, a jus prætorium, nearly equivalent to the modern phrase of equity, which practically superseded the old law, and in the provinces was the only law. No one who has ever looked at the DIGEST will complain of this Prætorian law as brief; nor will anyone who has read any portion of it fail to admire the skill with which legal principles are worked out. Some of the edicts of the Prætors are so obviously just and expedient, and are so tersely expressed, that they have been generally adopted, and are quoted as legal maxims by those who often do not know whence they came. Two edicts were restitutory: "Prætor ait, Quod vi aut clam factum est qua de re agitur id cum experiendi potestas est, restituas" (DIGEST, lib. 43, tit. 24, art. 1). This relieved the true owner from the usucapio which transferred the dominium in consequence of a possession of two years if the possession was not peaceable, or not open.

"Ait Prætor, Quod precario ab illo habes aut dolo malo fecisti ut desineres habere qua de re agitur, id illi restituas" (DIGEST, lib. 43, tit. 26, art. 2). This relieved him from the effect of a possession of two years if it was not adverse, or if it was fraudulent. By a prohibitory edict, "Uti possidetis" (DIGEST lib. 43, tit. 17), the Prætor forbid any one to disturb, by force, any possession which had been obtained "nec vi, nec clam, nec precario." And on the basis principally, but not exclusively, of those three edicts, the Prætors established what was called the "præscriptio longi temporis." I will read what POTHIER says in his treatise "De la Prescription, Article Préliminaire, Article 3." I quote from the eighth volume of POTHIER's works by M. DUPIN, p. 390:

"Suivant ce droit du prêteur le possesseur de bonne foi, qui avait eu une possession paisible et non interrompue, soit d'un droit incorporel, soit d'un héritage qui n'était pas du nombre de ceux qui étaient res mancipi, pendant le temps de dix ans inter présentes et de vingt ans inter absentes, acquerrait après l'accomplissement du temps de sa possession, non le domaine de la chose, mais une prescription ou fin de non recevoir, à l'effet d'exclure la demande en revendication du propriétaire de la chose, qui n'aurait été intentée qu'après l'accomplissement de ce temps. Depuis, on avait aussi accordé une action utile à ce possesseur pour revendiquer la chose, lorsqu'il en avait perdu la possession après l'accomplissement du temps de la prescription."

Thus the Prætors, while professing to leave the Law of the Tables in force, at least within the old territory of the Republic, practically deprived it of all force. JUSTINIAN by two laws (CODEX, lib. 7, tit. 25), "De nudo jure Quiritium tollendo," and tit. 31, "De usucapione transformanda," changed all this. The two laws are couched in terms that show that those who framed them had very little respect for antiquity, and were intolerant of legal fictions. JUSTINIAN, says POTHIER, by these enactments has changed the prescription of ten and twenty years into a true "usucapio," for they have caused the "dominium" to pass to the possessor of the heritage, or the incorporeal right of which he has had during that time a possession or quasi-possession peaceable and not interrupted.

The name of prescription has, however, survived the thing. And in the numerous provinces into which France was before the Revolution divided, many of which were governed by their own customs, the laws of prescription varied. DOMAT in his treatise on the CIVIL LAW (I quote from the translation by Doctor STRAHAN), book 3, title 7, s. 4, says:

"It is not necessary to consider the motives of these different dispositions of the Roman law, nor the reasons why they are not observed in many of the customs. Every usage hath its views, and considers in the opposite usages their inconveniences. And it sufficeth to remark here what is common to all these different dispositions of the Roman law, and of the customs as to what concerns the times of prescriptions. Which consists in two views; one, to leave to the owners of things, and to those who pretend to any rights, a certain time to recover them; and the other to give peace and quiet to those whom others would disturb in their possessions or in their rights after the said time is expired."

Those who framed the CODE NAPOLÉON had to make one law for all France. To facilitate their task they divided servitudes into classes, those that were continuous and those that were discontinuous, and those that were apparent and non-apparent (CODE CIVIL, Arts. 688, 689). Those divisions, and the definitions, were, as far as I can discover, perfectly new, for, though the difference between the things must always have existed, I cannot find any trace of the distinction having been taken in the old French law, and it certainly is not to be found in any English law authority before GALE ON EASEMENTS in 1839. On this division their legislation was founded. The first Projet of the CODE allowed continuous servitudes, whether apparent or not, and discontinuous servitudes, if apparent, to be gained by title or by possession for thirty years. The CODE CIVIL as it was finally adopted by art.

A 690, allows servitudes, if continuous and apparent, to be acquired by title or by possession for thirty years, and by art. 691 enacts that continuous servitudes not apparent and servitudes, if discontinuous, whether apparent or not, can only in future be established by titles, but saves vested rights already acquired. The authors of LEX PANDECTES FRANÇAISES (Paris, 1804), on whose authority I state this, say (vol. v., p. 488) that this great change from the principle of the Projet was made without any publication of the discussions concerning it, or of the reasons that led to it. And they state more openly than I should have expected in a book published in Paris in 1804, that in their opinion it was not an improvement. It certainly has never been received in English law.

I think that what I have above stated is quite enough to confirm LORD STAIR'S position that the laws of different countries relating to prescription are positive laws differing in matter, manner, and time in different countries. I think that, though the English law as to prescription was, beyond controversy, greatly derived from the Roman law, the very words of which are often quoted in the earliest English authorities, yet, to borrow the idea expressed by DOMAT in the passage I have above cited, every system of law is founded on its own ideas of expediency, and that we must look to the English decisions to see what principles have been adopted in it, as upon the balance of inconvenience and convenience expedient, and what have in it been rejected as on the balance inexpedient.

It cannot be disputed that from the earliest times the owner of adjoining land was bound to respect the access of light and air acquired by enjoyment of an ancient window. The immemorial custom of London to build upon an ancient foundation, though thereby an ancient window was obstructed, which was pleaded and held to be a good custom in Hughes v. Keme (25), in 1613, proves the great antiquity of this law. But as far as I find, the first mention of it in a reported case is Bowry and Pope's Case (26). I will read the whole of it, for, though the point actually decided was only that a window first erected in the reign of Queen Mary, that is, after 1553, and not later than 1558, had not acquired in 1587 the status of an ancient window, I think the opinion of the court on points not actually decided is important.

F "Bowry brought an action upon the case against Pope, and declared that in the time of Edward VI, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster leased two houses in St. Martin's, in London, to Mason for sixty years. The which Mason leased one of the said houses to one A, and covenanted by the indenture of lease with the said A, that it should be lawful for the said A, his executors and assigns, to make a window in the shop of the house so to him assigned, and afterwards in G the time of Queen Mary a window was made accordingly where no window was there before. And afterwards A assigned the said house to the plaintiff. And now Pope, having a house adjoining, had erected a new building super solum ipsius Pope ex opposito the said new window, so as the new window is thereby stopped. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and it was found for the plaintiff. And it was moved for the defendant in arrest of judgment that here upon the declaration appeareth no cause of action, for the window, in the stopping of H which the wrong is assigned, appears upon the plaintiff's own showing to be of late erected scilicet in the time of Queen Mary. The stopping of which by any act upon my own land was held lawful and justifiable by the whole court. But if it were an ancient window time out of memory, &c., there the light or benefit I of it ought not to be impaired by any act whatsoever, and such was the opinion of the whole court. But if the case had been that the house and soil upon which Pope had erected the said building had been under the estate of Mason, who covenanted as above said, then Pope could not have justified the nuisance, which was granted by the whole court."

It is for this last opinion that I cite the case. The Court of Common Pleas do not seem to have felt the difficulty which pressed so strongly on LITLEDALE, J., in Moore v. Rawson (6), and which leads FRY, J., in his very able opinion, to declare that this right does not lie in grant [post p. 29]. They seem to have had no doubt that the express covenant operated as a grant of the window, and that neither Mason nor any who held under his estate, could derogate from that grant by stopping the benefit of the window. A

In Trinity, 29 Eliz. [1587], about nine months later, the Queen's Bench, in Bland v. Moseley (27), decided the second point resolved by the Common Pleas the same way, and they also seem to have agreed with the third resolution. The reasons, as reported by LORD COKE, are: B

"It may be that, before time of memory, the owner of the said piece of land has granted to the owner of the said house to have the said windows without any stopping of them, and so the prescription may have a lawful beginning; and WRAY, C.J., then said that for stopping as well of the wholesome air as of light, an action lies, and damages shall be recovered for them, for both are necessary, for it is said et vescitur aura ætherea, and the said words horrida tenebritate are significant, and imply the benefit of the light. But he said that for prospect, which is a matter only of delight and not of necessity, no action lies for stopping thereof, and yet it is a great commendation of a house if it has a long and large prospect, unde dicitur, laudaturque domus longos quæ prospicit agros. But the law does not give an action for such things of delight." C

It will be noticed that not a word is said about the possibility of obstructing the light; and, indeed, it seems to me clear that no one could ever have thought of stopping his neighbour's lights by hoardings until it was established that uninterrupted enjoyment for a period short of time immemorial would give a right. Then some ingenious lawyer thought of that easy mode of preventing the acquisition of a right in a window not yet privileged. The distinction between a right to light and a right of prospect, on the ground that one is matter of necessity and the other of delight, is, to my mind, more quaint than satisfactory. A much better reason is given by LORD HARDWICKE in A.-G. v. Doughty (28), where he observes that if that was the case there could be no great towns. I think this decision, that a right of prospect is not acquired by prescription, shows that, while on the balance of convenience and inconvenience, it was held expedient that the right to light, which could only impose a burden upon land very near the house, should be protected when it had been long enjoyed, on the same ground it was held expedient that the right of prospect, which would impose a burden on a very large and indefinite area, should not be allowed to be created, except by actual agreement. This seems to me the real ground on which Webb v. Bird (9) and Chasemore v. Richards (10) are to be supported. The rights there claimed were analogous to prospect in this, that they were vague and undefined, and very extensive. Whether that is or is not the reason for the distinction, the law has always, since Bland v. Moseley (27), been that there is a distinction—that the right of a window to have light and air is acquired by prescription, and that a right to have a prospect can only be acquired by actual agreement. D E F G

Shury v. Pigott (29), was decided in 1625. It seems to have excited a good deal of attention, and many things collaterally to have been discussed which were not necessary for the decision. The actual point decided in Shury v. Pigott (29) was, that in a conveyance there was (though nothing was said), an implied grant that neither the conveyor nor any who claimed under him should use their lands so as to deprive the property conveyed of what was necessary for its enjoyment, in that case an artificial supply of water, a principle which, in the case of a house, would certainly include support. H

In Palmer v. Fleshees (30) the first point ruled by TWYSDEN and WYNDHAM, JJ., was, I

"if I, being seised of land, lease forty feet to A, to erect a house upon it, and other forty feet to B to erect a house on it, and one of them builds a house, and then the other dig a cellar in his land by which the wall of the first house adjoining falls, no action lies for this. And so they said it had been adjudged in Shury v. Pigott (29), for each can make the best advantage of his own. but

A to them it seemed that the law was otherwise if it had been an ancient wall or house which fell by this digging."

The reference to Shury v. Pigott (29) shows that in this place "ancient" means "existing before the conveyance of the land." The point actually decided was as to light, and the ratio decidendi is thus stated in the report in 1 LEVINZ, 122.

B "It was resolved that, although it be a new messuage, yet no person who claims the land by purchase under the builder [vendor] can obstruct the lights any more than the builder himself could, who cannot derogate from his own grant, by TWYSDEN and WINDHAM, JJ., HYDE being absent and KELYNGE doubting. For the lights are a necessary and essential part of the house. And KELYNGE said, Suppose the land had been sold first and the house after, the vendee of the land might stop the lights. TWYSDEN, to the contrary, said, Whether the land be sold first or afterwards, the vendee of the land cannot stop the lights in the hands of the vendor or his assigns. But all agreed that a stranger having lands adjoining to a messuage newly erected, may stop the lights, for the building of any man on his lands cannot hinder his neighbour from doing what he will with his own lands; otherwise if the messuage be ancient, so that he has gained a right in the lights by prescription."

D I say nothing as to the questions whether there is an implied reservation where the lands are parted with, as well as an implied grant where the house is parted with; or whether, when the land is sold before the house is erected on it, but on the terms that a house is to be built, the purchaser is driven to have recourse to equity to protect his subsequently built house, as neither of these questions is raised by the facts in the present case. But I think it is now established law that one who conveys a house does, by implication and without express words, grant to the vendee all that is necessary and essential for the enjoyment of the house, and that neither he, nor any who claim under him, can derogate from his grant by using his land so as to injure what is necessary and essential to the house. And I think that the right of support from the adjoining soil is necessary and essential for the enjoyment of the house.

E If the motive for introducing prescription is that given in the DIGEST, lib. 41, tit. 3, art. 1, quoted before, I think it irresistibly follows that the owner of a house who has enjoyed the house with a de facto support for the period and under the conditions prescribed by law, ought to be protected in the enjoyment of that support, and should not be deprived of it by showing that it was not originally given to him. And I think that the decisions ending in Backhouse v. Bonomi (4), decide that he should not be deprived of it. FRY, J., thinks those decisions are contrary to principle, but too strong to be departed from [post p. 29]. I have come to the conclusion, for the reasons I have given, that they are founded on principle.

H But it still remains to inquire whether any of the doctrines established by the English law, which on the ground of expediency prevent the acquisition of a right by enjoyment, would apply. In Backhouse v. Bonomi (4) the workings which did the mischief were at a considerable distance from the plaintiff's house, and would not have done any harm if the intervening minerals had not been previously removed by the defendant. Very different considerations may arise where the intervening minerals have been removed by the plaintiff himself, or those under whose estate he claims, or even by a third person. I express no opinion as to this, because it is not raised by the facts; but I mention Birmingham Corp'n. v. Allen (31), to show that it has not been overlooked. Neither do I think it necessary to express any opinion as to the distinction taken in Solomon v. Vintners' Co. (32), where it was said that, at all events, the right, if it could be acquired against the next adjoining house, could not be acquired when there were intervening properties, for, in this case, the defendants' land which they excavated was next adjoining to the plaintiffs' house, and I think the right to support from the adjoining land is not open to the objection that it is extensive and indefinite, and so far analogous to a prospect. It seems much nearer in analogy to the right to the access of light to a window; perhaps if it were res integra one might doubt if it was expedient to protect an ancient window. But I see no ground for doubting that the right to forbid digging near the foundations of a house without taking proper precautions to avoid injuring it, is, for the reasons given by LUSH, J. (3 Q.B.D. at p. 89), one very little onerous to the neighbours, and one which it is expedient to give to the owner of the house.

No question here arises as to the effect of any disability on the part of the owner of the land, nor as to the effect of any restrictions arising from the state of the title. But a question does arise whether there was not, or at least might have been, evidence of something which would prevent the enjoyment here being of that nature which would give rise to prescription on the ground that the possession was not open. The edict of the Prætor that possession must not be vi vel clam, as I think, is so far adopted in English law that no prescriptive right can be acquired where there is any concealment, and probably none where the enjoyment has not been open. And in cases where the enjoyment was in the beginning wrongful, and the owner of the adjoining land may be said to have lost the full benefit of his rights through his laches, it may be a fair test of whether the enjoyment was open or not to ask whether it was such that the owner of the adjoining land, but for his laches, must have known what the enjoyment was, and how far it went. But in a case of support where there is no laches, and the rights of the owner of the adjoining land are curtailed for the public benefit, on the assumption that, in general, rights not exercised during a long time are not of much value, and that it is for the public good that such rights (generally trifling) should be curtailed in favour of quieting title, where that is the principle, I do not see that more can be requisite than to let the enjoyment be so open that it is known that some support is being enjoyed by the building. That is enough to put the owner of the land on exercising his full rights, unless he is content to suffer a curtailment, not in general of any consequence.

In the present case all that is suggested is that the plaintiffs' building was not an ordinary house, but a building used as a factory, which concentrated a great part of its weight on a pillar. It had stood for twenty-seven years, and, as far as appears, would, but for the defendants' operations, have stood for many more years; and there was nothing in the nature of concealment. Any one who entered the factory must have seen that it was supported in a great degree by the pillar. And there is not the slightest suggestion that those who made the excavation were not perfectly aware that the factory did rest on the pillar, or that they took such precautions as would have been sufficient if the building had been supported in a more usual way, but that the mischief happened from its unusual construction. That being so, I am at a loss to see what question the learned judge could, at the trial, on this evidence have left to the jury, beyond the question whether the building had for more than twenty years openly, and without concealment, stood as it was and enjoyed without interruption the support of the neighbouring soil. The judge offered to ask the jury if the building fell on account of the weight of the goods stored on the upper storey, and I cannot see what else could have been asked.

The second defence is a question of pure law. Ever since Quarman v. Burnett (33) it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them. So that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it: Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Rail. Co. (34); Pickard v. Smith (35); Tarry v. Ashton (36). I do not think either side disputed these principles, nor that.

A in Bower v. Peate (1), the Queen's Bench Division thought that the case of a man employing a contractor to excavate near the foundation of a house which had a right of support, fell within the second class of cases; nor that, if correctly decided, that case was decisive. But Butler v. Hunter (37) was relied on, which case the Court of Exchequer held fell within the first class of cases. I am not quite sure that I understand from the report what the state of the evidence was. But assuming that B the defendants are right in saying that it was such as to make the case not distinguishable from Bower v. Peate (1), I think that the reasoning in Bower v. Peate (1) is the more satisfactory of the two.

The Court of Appeal in this case ordered that unless the defendants elected within fourteen days to take a new trial, judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs. If your Lordships take the view of the case which I have stated, and which is that C of LUSH, J., POLLOCK, B., FIELD, MANISTY, and FRY, JJ., it will be sufficient to dismiss the appeal, for the time for the election to take a new trial is long passed, and it need not be noticed.

LORD WATSON.—It is unnecessary for me to make any lengthened observations in this case. Seeing that my opinion is in substantial concurrence with what has D already been said, few words of explanation will suffice to express my views.

I am of opinion that a right to lateral support from the adjoining soil may be acquired for a building which has enjoyed that support peaceably and without interruption for the prescriptive period of twenty years. That proposition appears to me to have been recognised as the law of England in a long series of weighty, if not conclusive, judicial opinions, and to have been tacitly accepted by this House E in Backhouse v. Bonomi (4). The obligation which the creation of such a right by user imposes upon the owner of the adjacent soil, is to give continued support to the building. Consistently with that obligation he can make any lawful use of his land which he thinks proper. He may dig into, or even remove, the strata from which the building derives support, provided he gives efficient substituted support, by means of a retaining wall or other device. The proprietor of the building cannot, according to the decision in Backhouse v. Bonomi (4), complain that his right F has been infringed, unless and until the stability of the edifice has been affected by the withdrawal of its lateral support.

I agree with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in holding the right in question to be a proper easement, and in the results which follow from taking that view of its character. In one sense every easement may be regarded as a right of G property in the owner of the dominant tenement, not a full or absolute right, but a limited right or interest in land which belongs to another, whose plenum dominium is diminished to the extent to which his estate is affected by the easement. But a right constituted in favour of estate A and its owners, in or over the adjoining lands of B is, in my opinion, of the nature of an easement, and that whether such right is one of the natural incidents of property, or has its origin in grant or H prescription. I am unable to regard the right of support to a building, whether lateral or vertical, as a negative easement, and I concur in the observations which have been made upon that point by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; as well as by LINDLEY and BOWEN, JJ.* It appears to me to be as truly a positive easement, as the well-known servitude oneris ferendi, when a wall or beam is rested on the servient tenement. The distinction between positive and negative easements I may not be of vital importance in the present case; but in dealing with this point I am probably influenced by the consideration that a decision to the effect that an easement of lateral support to buildings is negative, would form an unsatisfactory precedent in another part of the country where positive servitudes alone are capable of being acquired by prescriptive enjoyment.

* LINDLEY, J.: Lapse of time is essential to the acquisition of a right to have a building supported by the land of another person, and such right is by English law an easement, or a right in the nature of an easement. A little reflection, however, will suffice to show that the easement of lateral support is of a peculiar kind; it is not a purely negative easement like the

It appears to me, for reasons which have already been fully explained by your Lordships, that the respondents have adduced proof of possession for the prescriptive period sufficient to establish their right to support from the adjacent soil, for the new or altered building which has stood for the last twenty-seven years. I do not think that any question of fact is disclosed by the pleadings or by the evidence in the case, which ought to have been, but was not, submitted to the jury.

Upon the point of law which was not remitted to the learned judges who have favoured the House with their opinions upon the main questions arising in this appeal, I agree with your Lordships. The operations of the Commissioners were obviously attended with danger to the building in question, but these appellants seek to shelter themselves from responsibility by proving that they took their contractor bound to adopt all measures necessary for ensuring the safety of the building. When an employer contracts for the performance of work which, properly conducted, can occasion no risk to his neighbour's house which he is under obligation to support, he is not liable for damage arising from the negligence of the contractor. But in cases where the work is necessarily attended with risk he cannot free himself from liability by binding the contractor to take effectual precautions. He is bound, as in a question with the party injured, to see that the contract is performed, and is, therefore, liable, as well as the contractor, to repair any damage which may be done. I, therefore, concur in the judgment which has been proposed by your Lordships.

LORD COLERIDGE. I have read the opinions of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and LORD BLACKBURN. I entirely concur in their conclusions and the reasons they give for them.

Appeals dismissed.

right to light; for support, even when lateral, involves pressure on and an actual use of the laterally supporting soil. Further, the actual enjoyment of lateral support is incapable of interruption by physical means except by the removal of the soil which affords the support, or, in other words, by the destruction, more or less of the servient tenement.

BOWEN, J.: The form in which the presumption built upon a twenty years' enjoyment has usually been framed is that of a lost grant or covenant, according as the right claimed is to an affirmative or a negative easement. At the time when the twenty years' rule was first promulgated by the courts, a document under seal was the only specific mode known to the common law in which an incorporeal hereditament could be created. But there are many cases in which equitable rights in the nature of an easement arise without any deed at all. Even at a time when a deed was the only origin for an easement known to the common law, language is found in the judgments of the law courts suggestive of the notion that this lost deed was merely the specific form in which the lawful origin had taken shape. It is further to be noted that the exact inference recommended by the law was not, in the case of affirmative easements, that the consent of the adjoining owner had been first given during the twenty years' user, but that some lawful origin preceded the earliest act of enjoyment. The lost grant was in theory anterior to the user; it was not the shape in which the submission of the servient owner was supposed during the twenty years to mould itself. In this sense it is inaccurate to speak of such rights as arising from the twenty years' acquiescence of the servient owner. His acquiescence for twenty years, in the case of affirmative easements, was evidence that the right had existed previously. It appears to be manifest, in spite of some inexact expressions of earlier judges, that this presumption of a lost grant or covenant was nothing more than a rebuttable presumption of fact. It seems a contradiction in terms to maintain that this rebuttable presumption of the existence of a grant would not at any time have been necessarily counteracted by actual proof that no such grant ever had been made. The question, so far as lost grants and lost covenants are involved, seems to me to have lost much of its practical importance, owing to recent changes in the law. It would not now be sufficient to disprove a legal origin, unless the possibility of an equitable origin were negatived as well. Such is the history and character of the twenty years' rule as applied to affirmative easements, and further to the negative easement of the window light. Is there any valid reason to doubt that such also is its history and explanation as applied to the claim of support for modern buildings? The presumption raised in cases of support to buildings by the shorter user of twenty years is modelled upon the presumption growing out of immemorial enjoyment. The one presumption is the echo at a distance of the other. The distinction is, that the shorter period gives rise to a rebuttable, the longer to an irresistible inference.

APPENDIX

FRY, J.—Before specifically replying to the questions propounded by your Lordships, I think it desirable to express the views which I entertain upon the general subject of the right of the owner of a building to lateral support for that building by the land of an adjoining proprietor. Such a right may be created by an actual instrument between the two owners. The right, being not to a thing to be done or used in the neighbour's soil, but to a limitation of the user of that soil by the neighbour himself, does not lie in grant, but would be created by a covenant by the neighbour not to use his own land in any manner inconsistent with the support of the adjoining buildings: see the judgment of LITLEDALE, J., in Moore v. Rawson (6); and such a covenant might either be express or might be inferred from the object and purport of the instrument, as in the Caledonian Rail. Co. v. Sprot (5).

D Leaving the consideration of the right as constituted by actual contract between the parties, questions of great difficulty arise; and, in respect to these, I have arrived at the conclusion that principle and authority are in direct opposition to one another. On principle it might well be held that every man must build his own house upon his own land, and that he cannot look to support from the land of adjoining proprietors. Such a principle would prevent the owner of a house from

E ever acquiring a right to lateral support except by actual contract.

An opposite view might be taken, for which also much reason could be given. The right of soil to support by adjoining soil is given by our law as a natural right, and it might well have been held that this natural right to support carried with it a right to the support of all those burdens which man is accustomed to lay upon the soil. On this principle, the right to support would arise as soon as the house

F was built, and would exist independently of user, consent or contract. It might thus be reasonable to hold that a house should never have the right of support, or that it should always have it. But I am unable to find any principle upon which to justify the acquisition of the right to support by a house independently of express covenant or grant. For casting aside all technicalities, I think that the only principle upon which rights of a kind like the one in question can be acquired is that

G of acquiescence. But I further think that, as he who cannot prevent cannot acquiesce, and as the owner of adjoining land cannot prevent his neighbour from erecting a house upon his own land, he can never be said to have acquiesced in the construction of that house, or in the burden which thence results. Such are the conclusions to which I should be driven by a consideration of this question on principle.

H When I turn to the authorities of our law bearing on the subject, I find, as it appears to me, that it has been decided that an ancient house does possess the right in question, that a new house does not possess this right, and, consequently, that the right is one which may be acquired independently of express covenant. All the efforts which I have made to find some principle upon which to justify the authorities have to my mind entirely failed. I must now consider somewhat more

I in detail the views which I have thus briefly expressed. In the absence of express stipulation, rights of the kind to which the one now in question belongs, can arise in law only from one or other of two sources, namely, either as incidents attached to property by nature herself, or as incidents attached to property by the force of long-continued user under circumstances importing acquiescence in such user.

There is no doubt on the authorities that, as the support of soil by soil is in fact a result of nature, so the right to such support is given by the law as ex jure nature, and as a proprietary right. It arises in all its force the moment two adjoining pieces of land are held by different owners and has no connection with the user of the land :

Humphries v. Brogden (2); Rowbotham v. Wilson (3). But it is equally clear on the cases that the right to support of buildings by land is not a right ex jure naturæ, but must arise by grant, or, as I think more accurately speaking, by covenant (Partridge v. Scott (38)), and to the like effect are the judgments of the Queen's Bench in Humphries v. Brogden (2), and of the Exchequer Chamber in Bonomi v. Backhouse (4). That the right in question may be acquired, even where no instrument creating it is shown, is established as a matter of positive law by a series of authorities which appear to determine (i) that the owner of an ancient building has a right of action against the owner of land adjoining, if he disturb his land so as to take away the lateral support previously afforded by that land, and (ii) that the owner of a new building has no such right. The authorities, commencing in the year 1803, include rulings at nisi prius by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., PARKE, B., and COCKBURN, C.J.; an expression of opinion by BLACKBURN, J., and judgments by the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas which assert or involve the propositions referred to; and, though no clear authority of an earlier date is found, the distinction between a new and an old house as regards the right to support appears to be hinted at in Wilde v. Minsterley (39) and Palmer v. Fleshees (30). These cases constitute a body of authority, which, in my opinion, must be regarded as conclusive that, according to the law of England, an ancient house possesses a right to support from the adjoining soil; and, therefore, I answer your Lordships' first question in the affirmative.

From what I have said it follows that a right to support may, according to our law, be acquired independently of express contract; and, in order to answer your Lordships' second question, it becomes essential to inquire on what principle, in what time, and under what circumstances it may be so acquired. Mere lapse of time can never, it appears to me, on any intelligible principle, confer a right not previously possessed; though lapse of time accompanied by inaction, where action ought to be taken, may well have such a result: Gray v. Bond (40). Strictly speaking, the right in question cannot, I think, be prescribed for; for it is common learning that prescription can only be for incorporeal hereditaments, "and cannot be for a thing which cannot be raised by grant" (BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, book ii, c. 17), and, as I have already shown, the right in question does not, in my opinion, lie in grant. But leaving such technical questions aside, I prefer to observe that, in my opinion, the whole law of prescription and the whole law which governs the presumption or inference of a grant or covenant rests upon acquiescence. The courts and the judges have had recourse to various expedients for quieting the possession of persons in the exercise of rights which have not been resisted by the persons against whom they are exercised, but in all cases it appears to me that acquiescence and nothing else is the principle upon which these expedients rest.

It becomes then of the highest importance to consider of what ingredients acquiescence consists. In many cases, as, for instance, in the case of that acquiescence which creates a right of way, it will be found to involve, first, the doing of some act by one man upon the land of another; secondly, the absence of right to do that act in the person doing it; thirdly, the knowledge of the person affected by it that the act is done; fourthly, the power of the person affected by the act to prevent such act either by act on his part or by action in the courts; and lastly, the abstinence by him from any such interference for such a length of time as renders it reasonable for the courts to say that he shall not afterwards interfere to stop the act being done. In some other cases, as, for example, in the case of lights, some of these ingredients are wanting; but I cannot imagine any case of acquiescence in which there is not shown to be in the servient owner: (i) a knowledge of the acts done; (ii) a power in him to stop the acts or to sue in respect of them; and (iii) an abstinence on his part from the exercise of such power.

That such is the nature of acquiescence and that such is the ground upon which presumptions or inferences of grant or covenant may be made appears to me to be plain, both from reason, from maxim, and from the cases. As regards the reason of the case, it is plain good sense to hold that a man who can stop an asserted right

- A or a continued user, and does not do so for a long time, may be told that he has lost his right by his delay and his negligence, and every presumption should therefore be made to quiet a possession thus acquired and enjoyed by the tacit consent of the sufferer. But there is no sense in binding a man by an enjoyment he cannot prevent, or quieting a possession which he could never disturb. Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest, assentire videtur (2 COKE'S INSTITUTES 305), per PARKE, B., in Morgan v. Thomas (18), 8 Exch. at p. 304; Contra non valentem agere, nulla currit prescriptio (POTHIER, TRAITÉ DES OBLIGATIONS, part iii, chap. viii, art. 2, s. 2; BROOM'S MAXIMS (5th Edn.) 903) are two maxims which show that prescription and assent are only raised where there is a power of prohibition. And again, Chasemore v. Richards (10), Webb v. Bird (9), and Sturges v. Bridgman (11), have established a principle that an enjoyment which a man cannot prevent raises no presumption of consent or acquiescence.

- Assuming such to be the true grounds and principles of acquiescence, I next inquire how they can be applied to the question of the right of a house to be supported by the adjoining land. It has been argued that the doctrine applies in its simplest form to the right in question; for that the act of building a house on one piece of land which derives lateral support from the adjoining soil of a different owner is both actionable and preventible, and that, therefore, time constitutes a valid bar. Is such a building actionable? I think not. The lateral pressure of a heavy building on soft ground which causes an ascertainable physical disturbance in a neighbour's soil would no doubt be trespass; but no one ever heard of an action for the mere increment caused by reason of a new building to the pre-existing lateral pressure of soil on soil, producing no ascertainable physical disturbance. If that were the law no one could rightly build on the edge of his land, unless he built upon a rock; and yet the building of walls and other structures on the borders of land is universally recognised as lawful. Nay more, any erection of a house would give a right of action not only to the adjoining neighbours, but to every owner of land within the unascertainable area over which the increase of pressure must, according to the law of physics, extend. Such an increase of pressure when unattended with ascertainable physical consequences is, in my opinion, one of those minima of which the law takes no heed. The distinction between the principles applicable to water collected into visible streams and that running in invisible ones through the ground, affords a very good analogy to the distinction which I draw between the pressure of an adjoining house which produces a visible displacement of the soil, and that which produces no visible or ascertainable result, but is only a matter of inference from physical science or subsequent experiment.

- Is the support of the house by the adjoining soil preventible? I think not. It is, of course, physically possible for one man so to excavate his own soil as to let down his neighbour's building, and a man may or may not have occasion to excavate his own land for his own purposes, but such an excavation for the sole purpose of letting down a neighbour's house is of so expensive, so difficult, so churlish a character, that it is not reasonably to be required in order to prevent the acquisition of a right. In fact, in the case of adjoining houses, it would be to require a man to destroy his own property in order to protect his rights to it. In the case of air, it is physically possible for the adjoining owners to build a lofty wall round a windmill and shut out the access of air; and in the case of underground water it would, at least in some cases, be physically possible to construct a water-tight barrier through all the water-bearing strata of the soil; but such acts would require such an unreasonable waste of time and money that the not doing of them has been held to import no acquiescence in the flow of air and water respectively: Chasemore v. Richards (10) and Webb v. Bird (9). If the building of a house by one man which derives support from the adjoining land is neither actionable nor preventible by the owner of the adjoining soil, it seems difficult to see on what principle a covenant as to the user of his own soil can be inferred against the man who can do nothing. The right to support and the rights to the access of light and air are very similar the one to the other, and are broadly distinguished from most other easements or analogous rights. They are negative as contrasted with affirmative easements. They are analogous with servitudes ne facias in the civil law. Such rights, when they arise, spring, not from acts originally actionable or unlawful on the part of the dominant owner, but from acts done on his own land and within his own rights; they confer on the dominant owner, not the right to use the subject, but a right to forbearance on the part of the owner from using the subject; i.e., they create an obligation on the owner of the servient tenement not to do anything on his own land inconsistent with a particular user of the dominant tenement: AUSTIN'S JURISPRUDENCE (3rd Edn.), vol. 2, p. 836. They rest on a presumption or inference, not of a grant by the neighbour of a right to do something on the grantor's land, but of a covenant by the owner not to do something on his own land. It is difficult in principle to see how such rights can arise from the doing of lawful acts on the dominant tenement, except in the few cases where the owner of the servient tenement can both lawfully and with reasonable ease interfere to prevent the continued user by his neighbour.

The close likeness between the right to support and to light has been much pressed on your Lordships as a reason for inferring a right to support by analogy with the cases which, before the Prescription Act, established the right to light. The peculiarity of these cases is that the courts required the servient owner to submit to the acquisition of the right by his neighbour, or to signify his dissent by putting up an actual obstruction. BAYLEY, J., in Cross v. Lewis (19), said:

"If his neighbour objects to [the windows] he may put up an obstruction, but that is his only remedy."

This rule as to light appears to have arisen without any full discussion in the courts of the principle on which it rests. But it is plain that the erection of an obstruction was thought so slight a matter that it might reasonably be demanded of a servient owner to negative acquiescence on his part. This rule I consider to be an anomaly, and, therefore, as not furnishing any principle which ought to be extended. LORD WENSLEYDALE, in Chasemore v. Richards (10), said:

"It is going very far to say that a man must be at the expense of putting up a screen to window lights to prevent a title being gained by twenty years' enjoyment of light passing through a window."

WILLES, J., in Webb v. Bird (9), said:

"These cases as compared with the general law are anomalous."

In the same case in the Exchequer Chamber, BLACKBURN, J., said:

"The case of a right to light before the statute stood on a peculiar ground."

BRAMWELL, L.J., in Bryant v. Lefever (24), said:

"Anyone who reads the cases relating to an acquisition of a right to light will see that there has been great difficulty in establishing it on principle."

Accordingly, in Chasemore v. Richards (10), your Lordships' House declined to apply the analogy drawn from lights to water passing through the earth in unascertained courses, and the Courts of Common Pleas, Exchequer Chamber, and Appeal have declined to apply it to the cases of air: Webb v. Bird (9), Bryant v. Lefever (24); and of noise: Sturges v. Bridgman (11). Lastly, the way in which the Prescription Act deals with the right to light is significant of its anomalous character. It deals, on the one hand, with easements of an affirmative character which are capable of interruption by the servient owner. It deals, on the other hand, not with negative easements generally, but with the right to light alone of all the class to which it belongs. I believe that this argument, derived from the law of lights, has exercised a great influence on the establishment of the right to support, but I consider that, in principle, it affords no justification for the establishment of such a right.

In order that acquiescence may arise, there must, in my opinion, be the power to prevent; and this, I conclude, for the reasons I have given, is wanting in the

A case of the support of buildings by adjoining soil. But there is, in my opinion, equally wanting another element, namely, knowledge in the owner of the servient tenement. No doubt the owner of property knows, or should be taken to know, what occurs openly and visibly on his estate, or in its immediate neighbourhood, but not that which takes place underground or in a secret manner. Hence, he is justly charged with knowledge that his neighbour walks habitually over his land, or has erected a house with windows deriving light over his fields; but he would not be affected with knowledge of the user of a gangway or gallery constructed in the course of secret mining operations. The question, whether a building does, or does not, derive any practical support from the neighbouring land is one which it appears to me often extremely difficult to answer even for the building owner, and far more difficult to answer for the adjoining owner, who may be ignorant of the nature of the structure erected behind a hoarding—of the incidence of its burden on the soil—of the depth and character of the foundations, whether extending to the rock or resting on the surface soil—and of the nature of the sub-soil itself. He may, indeed, excavate his own land, and probably answer the last of these questions; but, on the other topics, he has no certain means of information, except by a trespass or an impertinence. It is evident that, where the building is on the outcrop of strata, or where the beds have been intersected by dykes or disturbed by faults, it would be difficult or impossible to tell what is the incidence of the burden created by a house except by actual excavation and experiment. The circumstances of the case render it, in my opinion, unjust to impute to a neighbour that plain knowledge of what is going on in his neighbourhood which can alone justify the depriving a man of a right to use his own land in a lawful manner.

E In Solomon v. Vintners' Co. (32) the question was as to the right of support of one house by another not immediately adjoining, on the ground of thirty years' enjoyment of such support, and there BRAMWELL, B., made some observations which seem very relevant to the present inquiry. Supposing such a right to exist, he said (4 H. & N. at p. 602):

F “it must be either as a matter of absolute right, or as a matter of prescription, or under the Prescription Act, or as founded on some supposed lost grant. In any of these cases, it can only exist if the benefit was one that was enjoyed as of right, which cannot be unless it was openly and visibly enjoyed. An enjoyment must not be vi, precario, nor clam; it must be open. Now, when one house visibly leans towards another, a person may make a tolerably shrewd guess that it is partly supported by the other, but it will be only a conjecture. . . . In fact, it is impossible to say which house is being supported. It is true that, in this case, when the defendant's house was removed the plaintiff's house fell in; but probably nobody who saw the block of buildings would have guessed that such a result would have followed. If anyone had done so, it would have been but a matter of conjecture. Therefore, supposing that the plaintiff for more than twenty years had an enjoyment which he says ought now to continue, it was an enjoyment clam, not open, and consequently not as of right; [and] no title was gained under any of the different ways in which it has been surmised it might have been gained.”

H On principle, I conclude, therefore, that acquiescence does not apply to the right in question.

I Another argument in favour of the acquisition of the right in question has been based upon an analogy with the operation of the Statute of Limitations. To the extent of holding that, if the right is to be acquired at all by lapse of time, twenty years is a reasonable period to confer the right, I think that the analogy is sound; but beyond that it appears to me not to go. The Statute of Limitations presupposes a right of action, and takes it away if not put in force for twenty years; that furnishes no reason for casting a new burden upon a man where he has no capacity to bring an action or to create a physical obstruction to the exercise of the alleged right. To take away a right of action, if not put in force within a reasonable time, is one thing: to take away a man's right in his property because he does not bring an action which he cannot bring, seems to be quite another thing. The authorities which establish this existence of the right in question afford no distinct statement of the principle upon which it reposes, but there are to be found in them references to the open character of the user, to the knowledge of the servient owner, and to the lapse of time, which seem to show that some notion of acquiescence was in the minds of the learned judges; but when I ask myself what difference it makes whether the user be open or secret to a man who cannot stop such user, what is the value of knowledge to a man who cannot act on it, and what is the effect of a lapse of time in the course of which nothing can be done, I find myself unable to answer these inquiries; and I think that the circumstances under which the building has been erected and the support enjoyed are immaterial.

I regard the right as resting, not on any principle, but solely on a series of authorities which disclose no clear ground for its existence; but, as it has been established that the right in question may be acquired by the lapse of time, I think that the period of twenty years may and ought to be held a sufficient one to confer the right. The period of twenty years was that limited by the Limitation Act, 1623, for bringing possessory actions and making entries; it was applied by the judges to cases of prescription, so that before the Prescription Act the uninterrupted enjoyment of an easement for that length of time was constantly held to afford a ground for presuming the necessary grant or covenant; it has been referred to in Stansell v. Jollard (41), in Dodd v. Holmes (42), and in other of the authorities relative to this very right as sufficient to confer it; and it may well be maintained as reasonable in itself. I, therefore, answer your Lordships' second question in the affirmative. I have already shown that I view the right in question as the result of an artificial rule of law, with which knowledge and acquiescence have nothing to do. I, therefore, answer your Lordships' third question by saying that, in my opinion, if the acts done by the defendants would have caused no damage to the plaintiffs' building as it stood before the alterations made in 1849, it is not necessary to prove that the defendants or their predecessors in title had knowledge or notice of those alterations in order to make the damage done by their act in removing the lateral support after the lapse of twenty-seven years an actionable wrong.

For the reasons already given I submit (in answer to your Lordships' fifth question) my opinion that the course taken by the learned judge at the trial of directing a verdict for the plaintiffs was correct, according to the law of England as it now stands. His conclusion involves the proposition that, by the mere act of his neighbour and the lapse of time, a man may be deprived of the lawful use of his own land—a proposition which shocks my notions of justice, and against which I have struggled in vain; because I can find no reasonable proposition on which to rest the long line of decisions on the questions before your Lordships.

Negligence—Duty of supplier of goods—Exercise of ordinary skill and care to avoid possible danger—Opportunity for user to discover defect before use—Staging for painters of ship's hull.

Whenever one person is placed in such a position with regard to another, apart from any contract between them, that anyone of ordinary sense would at once recognise that, if he did not use ordinary and reasonable care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger. Whenever one person supplies goods, or machinery, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that anyone of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognise at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied, or the mode of supplying it, there would be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing was supplied, and who was to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing. For a neglect of such ordinary care and skill, whereby injury happens, a legal liability arises, to be enforced by an action for negligence. This includes the case of goods, etc., supplied to be used immediately by a particular person or persons, or one of a class of persons, where it would be obvious to the person supplying that the goods would in all probability be used at once by such persons before there could be a reasonable opportunity for discovering any defect which might exist, and where the thing supplied would be of such a nature that a neglect of ordinary care and skill as to its condition, or the manner of supplying it, would probably cause danger to the person or property of the person for whose use it was supplied, and who was about to use it: per SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., COTTON, L.J., and BOWEN, L.J., dubitante.

A master painter contracted with a shipowner to paint a ship, then lying in dock. The defendant, the dock owner, contracted with the shipowner to erect a staging round the ship for the purpose of having the hull painted. While the plaintiff, who was in the master painter's employment, was engaged in painting the hull, the staging gave way, owing to the defective condition of a rope which supported it, in consequence of which the plaintiff fell and was injured. In an action for damages for such injuries, Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (FIELD and CAVE, JJ.), making a rule absolute to set aside a judgment which had been entered for the plaintiff at Bow County Court.

The action was brought in the Bow County Court to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff while working in the defendant's dock, through the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff, a ship painter, was employed by one Gray to paint a ship then lying in the defendant's dock. The shipowner had contracted with Gray for the painting of the ship, and the defendant, the dock owner, had agreed to supply and erect a staging round the ship for that purpose. Owing to a defect in one of the ropes supplied by the defendant to support the staging, the staging gave way while the plaintiff was at work upon it, whereby he was thrown down and severely injured. The rope, when examined after the accident, appeared to have been burnt at the place where it broke, but there was no evidence to show its condition when the staging was put up, or that the defendant or his servants had any knowledge that the rope was defective. The defendant had no control over the plaintiff during the progress of the work. At the trial the defendant contended that the plaintiff was not in his employment, that there was no privity of contract between them, and that the plaintiff, therefore, could not recover. The learned county court judge, however, gave judgment for the plaintiff for damages, of which the amount was agreed upon between the parties. The defendant obtained a rule nisi to set aside the judgment on the ground that there was no evidence of the defendant's liability to the plaintiff, or that, upon the facts proved at the trial, judgment should have been entered for the defendant. The Divisional Court (FIELD and CAVE, JJ.) made the rule absolute to enter judgment for the defendant, and from this decision the plaintiff appealed. A

Cur. adv. vult. B

July 30, 1883. The following judgments were read.

SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff was a workman in the employ of Gray, a ship painter. Gray entered into a contract with a shipowner, whose ship was in the defendant's dock, to paint the outside of his ship. The defendant, the dock owner, supplied, under a contract with the shipowner, an ordinary stage, to be slung in the ordinary way outside the ship for the purpose of painting her. It must have been known to the defendant's servants, if they had considered the matter at all, that the stage would be put to immediate use; that it would not be used by the shipowner, but that it would be used by such a person as the plaintiff, a working ship painter. The ropes by which the stage was slung, which were supplied as a part of the instrument by the defendant, had been scorched and were unfit for use, and were supplied without a reasonably careful attention to their condition. When the plaintiff began to use the stage the ropes broke, the stage fell, and the plaintiff was injured. The Divisional Court held that the plaintiff could not recover against the defendant. The plaintiff appealed. C D

The action is, in form and substance, an action for negligence. That the stage was, through want of attention of the defendant's servants, supplied in a state unsafe for use is not denied. But want of attention, amounting to a want of ordinary care, is not a good cause of action, although injury ensue from such want, unless the person charged with such want of ordinary care had a duty to the person complaining to use ordinary care in respect of the matter called in question. Actionable negligence consists in the neglect of the use of ordinary care or skill towards a person to whom the defendant owes the duty of observing ordinary care and skill, by which neglect the plaintiff has suffered injury to his person or property. E F

The question in this case is whether the defendant owed such a duty to the plaintiff. If a person contracts with another to use ordinary care or skill towards him or his property, the obligation need not be considered in the light of a duty; it is an obligation of contract. It is undoubted, however, that there may be the obligation of such a duty from one person to another, although there is no contract between them with regard to such duty. Two drivers meeting have no contract with each other, but under certain circumstances they have a reciprocal duty towards each other. So two ships navigating the sea. So a railway company, which has contracted with one person to carry another, has no contract with the person carried, but has a duty towards that person. So the owner or occupier of house or land who permits a person or persons to come to his house or land has no contract with such person or persons, but has a duty towards him or them. It should be observed that the existence of a contract between two persons does not prevent the existence of the suggested duty between them also being raised by law, independently of the contract, by the facts with regard to which the contract is made, and to which it applies an exactly similar but a contract duty. G H I

We have not in this case to consider the circumstances in which an implied contract may arise, to use ordinary care and skill to avoid danger to the safety of person or property. We have not in this case to consider the question of a fraudulent misrepresentation, express or implied, which is a well-recognised head of law. The questions which we have to solve in this case are: What is the proper definition of the relation between two persons, other than the relation established by contract or fraud, which imposes on the one of them a duty towards the other to observe, with regard to the person or property of such other, such ordinary care

A or skill as may be necessary to prevent injury to his person or property? and Whether the present case falls within such definition?

When two drivers or two ships are approaching each other, such a relation arises between them, when they are approaching each other in such a manner that, unless they use ordinary care and skill to avoid it, there will be danger of an injurious collision between them. This relation is established in such circumstances between B them, not only if it can be proved that they actually know and think of this danger, but whether such proof be made or not. It is established, as it seems to me, because anyone of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that, if he did not use ordinary care and skill under such circumstances, there would be such danger. And everyone ought, by the universally recognised rules of right and wrong, to think so much with regard to the safety of others who may be C jeopardised by his conduct; and if, being in such circumstances, he does not think, and in consequence neglects, or if he neglects to use ordinary care or skill, and injury ensue, the law, which takes cognisance of and enforces the rules of right and wrong, will force him to give an indemnity for the injury.

In the case of a railway company carrying a passenger with whom it has not entered into the contract of carriage, the law implies the duty, because it must be D obvious that unless ordinary care and skill be used the personal safety of the passenger must be endangered. With regard to the condition in which an owner or occupier leaves his house or property, other phraseology has been used which it is necessary to consider. If a man opens his shop or warehouse to customers it is said that he invites them to enter, and that this invitation raises the relation between them which imposes on the inviter the duty of using reasonable care so to E keep his house or warehouse that it may not endanger the person or property of the person invited [see now Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, 37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 832]. This is in a sense an accurate phrase, and, as applied to the circumstances, a sufficiently accurate phrase. Yet it is not accurate if the word "invitation" be used in its ordinary sense. By opening a shop you do not really invite—you do not ask A. B. to come in to buy, you intimate to him that if it pleases F him to come in he will find things which you are willing to sell. So in the case of a shop, warehouse, road, or premises, the phrase has been used that if you permit a person to enter them, you impose on yourself a duty not to lay a trap for him. This, again, is in a sense a true statement of the duty arising from the relation constituted by the permission to enter. It is not a statement of what causes the relation which raises the duty. What causes the relation is the permission to enter G and the entry. But it is not a strictly accurate statement of the duty. To lay a trap means, in ordinary language, to do something with an intention. Yet it is clear that the duty extends to a danger, the result of negligence without intention. And with regard to both these phrases, though each covers the circumstances to which it is particularly applied, yet it does not cover the other set of circumstances from which an exactly similar legal liability is inferred.

H It follows, as it seems to me, that there must be some larger proposition which involves and covers both sets of circumstances. The logic of inductive reasoning requires that, where two major propositions lead to exactly similar minor premises, there must be a more remote and larger premise which embraces both of the major propositions. That, in the present consideration, is, as it seems to me, the same proposition which will cover the similar legal liability inferred in the cases of I collision and carriage. The proposition which these recognised cases suggest, and which is, therefore, to be deduced from them, is that whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that anyone of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that, if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger. Without displacing the other propositions, to which allusion has been made as applicable to the particular circumstances in respect of which they have been enunciated, this proposition includes, I think, all the recognised cases of liability. It is the only proposition which covers them all. It may, therefore, safely be affirmed to be a true proposition, unless some obvious case can be stated in which the liability must be admitted to exist, and which yet is not within this proposition. There is no such case. A

Let us apply this proposition to the case of one person supplying goods, or machinery, or instruments, or utensils, for the purpose of their being used by another person, but with whom there is no contract as to the supply. The proposition will stand thus. Whenever one person supplies goods, or machinery, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that anyone of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognise at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied, or the mode of supplying it, there would be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing was supplied, and who was to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing. And for a neglect of such ordinary care or skill, whereby injury happens, a legal liability arises, to be enforced by an action for negligence. This includes the case of goods, etc., supplied to be used immediately by a particular person or persons, or one of a class of persons, where it would be obvious to the person supplying, if he thought, that the goods would in all probability be used at once by such persons before there could be a reasonable opportunity for discovering any defect which might exist, and where the thing supplied would be of such a nature that a neglect of ordinary care or skill as to its condition, or the manner of supplying it, would probably cause danger to the person or property of the person for whose use it was supplied, and who was about to use it. It would exclude a case in which the goods are supplied under circumstances in which it would be a chance by whom they would be used, or whether they would be used or not, or whether they would be used before there would probably be means of observing any defect, or where the goods would be of such a nature that a want of care or skill as to their condition, or the manner of supplying them, would not probably produce danger of injury to person or property. The cases of vendor and purchaser, and lender and hirer under contract, need not be considered, as the liability arises under the contract, and not merely as a duty imposed by law, though it may not be useless to observe that it seems difficult to import the implied obligation into the contract, except in cases in which, if there were no contract between the parties, the law would, according to the rule above stated, imply the duty. B C D E F

Examining the rule which has been above enunciated with the cases which have been decided with regard to goods supplied for the purpose of being used by persons with whom there is no contract, the first case to be considered is inevitably Langridge v. Levy (1). It is not an easy case to act upon. It is not, it cannot be, accurately reported; the declaration is set out; the evidence is assumed to be reported; the questions left to the jury are stated; and then it is said that a motion was made to enter a nonsuit in pursuance of leave reserved on particular grounds. Those grounds do not raise the question of fraud at all, but only the question of remoteness. And although the question of fraud seems, in a sense, to have been left to the jury, yet no question was, according to the report, left to them whether the plaintiff acted on the faith of the fraudulent misrepresentation, which is, nevertheless, a necessary question in a case of fraudulent misrepresentation. The report of the argument makes the object of the argument depend entirely upon an assumed motion to arrest the judgment, which raises always a discussion depending entirely on the form of the declaration, and the effect on it of a verdict, in respect of which it is assumed that all questions were left to the jury. If this was the point taken, the report of the evidence and of the questions left to the jury is idle. The case was decided on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation as stated in the declaration. It is inferred that the defendant intended the representation to be communicated to the son. Why he should have such an intention, in fact, it seems difficult to understand. His immediate object must have been to induce the father G H I

A to buy and pay for the gun. It must have been wholly indifferent to him whether, after the sale and payment, the gun would be used or not by the son.

I cannot hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the case is a wholly unsatisfactory case to act on as an authority. But, taking the case to be decided on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation made hypothetically to the son, and acted upon by him, such a decision upon such a ground in no way negatives the proposition
 B that the action might have been supported on the ground of negligence without fraud. It seems to be a case which is within the proposition enunciated in this judgment, and in which the action might have been supported without proof of actual fraud. And this seems to be the meaning of CLEASBY, B., in the observations he made on Langridge v. Levy (1) in George v. Skivington (2). In that case the proposition laid down in this judgment is clearly adopted. The ground of the
 C decision is that the article was, to the knowledge of the defendant, supplied for the use of the wife, and for her immediate use. And certainly if he, or anyone in his position, had thought at all, it must have been obvious that a want of ordinary care or skill in preparing the prescription sold would endanger the personal safety of the wife. In Corby v. Hill (3) it is stated by the Lord Chief Justice that an allurement was held out to the plaintiff; and WILLES, J., stated that the defendant
 D had no right to set a trap for the plaintiff. But in the form of declaration suggested by WILLES, J. (4 C.B.N.S. at p. 567), there is no mention of allurement, or invitation, or trap. The facts suggested in that form are "that the plaintiff had licence to go on the road; that he was in consequence accustomed and likely to pass along it; that the defendant knew of that custom and probability; that the defendant negligently placed slates in such a manner as to be likely to prove dangerous to persons driving along the road; that the plaintiff drove along the road, being E by reason of the licence lawfully on the road, and that he was injured by the obstruction." It is impossible to state a case more exactly within the proposition laid down in this judgment.

In Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (4) the phrase is again used of invitation to the plaintiff by the defendants. Again, let it be observed that there
 F is no objection to the phrase as applied to the case. But the real value of the phrase may not improperly be said to be that invitation imports knowledge by the defendant of the probable use by the plaintiff of the article supplied, and, therefore, carries with it the relation between the parties which establishes the duty. In Indermaur v. Dames (5) reliance is again placed on a supposed invitation of the plaintiff by the defendant. But, again, it is hardly possible to state facts which
 G bring a case more completely within the definition of the present judgment.

In Winterbottom v. Wright (6) it was held that there was no duty cast upon the defendant with regard to the plaintiff. The case was decided on what was equivalent to a general demurrer to the declaration. And the declaration does not seem to show that the defendant, if he had thought about it, must have known, or ought to have known, that the coach would be necessarily or probably driven by the
 H plaintiff, or by any class of which he could be said to be one, or that it would be so driven within any time which would make it probable that the defect would not be observed. The declaration relied too much on contracts entered into with other persons than the plaintiff. The facts alleged did not bring the case within the proposition herein enunciated. It was an attempt to establish a duty towards all the world. The case was decided on the ground of remoteness. And it is at too
 I great a remoteness that the observation of LORD ABINGER is pointed, when he says that the doctrine of Langridge v. Levy (1) is not to be extended.

In Francis v. Cockrell (7) the decision is put by some of the judges on an implied contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. But CLEASBY, B. (L.R. 5 Q.B. at p. 515), puts it on the duty raised by the knowledge of the defendant that the stand was to be used immediately by persons, of whom the plaintiff was one. In other words, he acts upon the rule above laid down. In Collis v. Selden (8) it was held that the declaration disclosed no duty, and obviously the declaration was too uncertain. There is nothing to show that the defendant knew more of the probability of the plaintiff, rather than any other of the public, being near the chandelier. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff was more likely to be in the public-house than any other member of the public. There is nothing to show how soon after the hanging of the chandelier anyone might be expected or permitted to enter the room in which it was. The facts stated do not bring it within the rule. There is an American case (Thomas v. Winchester (9) cited in MR. HORACE SMITH's treatise on the LAW OF NEGLIGENCE, p. 88, note t), which goes a very long way—I doubt whether it does not go too far. In Longmeid v. Holliday (10) a lamp was sold to the plaintiff to be used by the wife. The jury were not satisfied that the defendant knew of the defect in the lamp; if he did, there was fraud; if he did not, there seems to have been no evidence of negligence. If there was fraud, the case was more than within the rule; if there was no fraud, the case was not brought by other circumstances within the rule. In Gautret v. Egerton (11) the declaration was held by WILLES, J., to be bad on demurrer, because it did not show that the defendant had any reason to suppose that persons going to the docks would not have ample means of seeing the holes and cuttings relied on. He does not say there must be fraud in order to support the action. He says there must be something like fraud. He says: "Every man is bound not wilfully to deceive others." And then, in the alternative, he says, "or to do any act which may place them in danger."

There seems to be no case in conflict with the rule above deduced from well-admitted cases. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is a good, safe, and just rule. I cannot conceive that, if the facts were proved which would make out the proposition I have mentioned, the law can be that there would be no liability. Unless that be true the proposition must be true. If it be the rule, the present case is clearly within it. The case is also, I agree, within that which seems to me to be a minor proposition—namely, the proposition which has been often acted upon, that there was, in a sense, an invitation of the plaintiff by the defendant to use the stage. The appeal must, in my opinion, be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff.

COTTON, L.J.—The judgment I am about to read is concurred in by BOWEN, L.J. In this case the defendant was the owner of a dock for the repair of ships, and provided for use in the dock the stages necessary to enable the outside of the ship to be painted while in the dock, and the stages which were to be used only in the dock were appliances provided by the dock owner as appurtenant to the dock and its use. After the stage was handed over to the shipowner it no longer remained under the control of the dock owner. But when ships were received into the dock for repair, and provided with stages for the work on the ships which was to be executed there, all those who came to the vessels for the purpose of painting and otherwise repairing them were there for business in which the dock owner was interested, and they, in my opinion, must be considered as invited by the dock owner to use the dock and all appliances provided by the dock owner as incident to the use of the dock. To these persons, in my opinion, the dock owner was under an obligation to take reasonable care that, at the time the appliances provided for immediate use in the dock were provided by him, they were in a fit state to be used—that is, in such a state as not to expose those who might use them for the repair of the ship to any danger or risk not necessarily incident to the service in which they are employed [see now Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, supra].

That this obligation exists, as regards articles of which the control remains with the dock owner, was decided in Indermaur v. Dames (5); and in Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (4) the same principle was acted on. I think that the same duty must exist as to things supplied by the dock owner for immediate use in the dock, of which the control is not retained by the dock owner, to the extent of using reasonable care as to the state of the articles when delivered by him to the ship under repair for immediate use in relation to the repairs. For any neglect of those having control of the ship and the appliances he would not be liable, and

A to establish his liability it must be proved that the defect which caused the accident existed at the time when the article was supplied by the dock owner.

Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (12) may be relied on as at variance with the opinion thus expressed by me, but I think that the objection is not well founded. If the plaintiff is to be considered as a volunteer, there would be no implied request or invitation to him by the defendant to use the dock and the appliances provided. But he was there for the purpose of work, for the due execution of which the defendant received the ship into his dock, and the defendant received payment as remuneration for allowing the work to be done in his dock, and for providing the necessary appliances for enabling it to be done. The plaintiff was, therefore, engaged in work, in the performance of which the defendant was interested, and he cannot be looked upon in the light of a volunteer. Whether the court was right in Blakemore Case (12) in treating the plaintiff as a volunteer may be a question. But, as the ground of the decision is that he was so, that circumstance prevents the case being an authority inconsistent in principle with the conclusion at which I have arrived.

This decides this appeal in favour of the plaintiff, and I am unwilling to concur with the Master of the Rolls in laying down unnecessarily the larger principle which he entertains, inasmuch as there are many cases in which the principle was impliedly negated. Take, for instance, Langridge v. Levy (1), to which the principle, if it existed, would have applied. But the judges who decided that case based their judgment on the fraudulent representation made to the father of the plaintiff by the defendant. In other cases, where that decision has been referred to, judges have treated fraud as the ground of the decision, as was done by COLERIDGE, J., in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (12); and in Collis v. Selden (8), WILLES, J., says that the judgment in Langridge v. Levy (1) was based on the fraud of the defendant. This impliedly negatives the existence of the larger general principle which is relied on, and the decisions in Collis v. Selden (8), and in Longmeid v. Holliday (10), in each of which the plaintiff failed, are, in my opinion, at variance with the principle contended for. George v. Skivington (2), and especially what is said by CLEASBY, B., in giving judgment in that case, seems to support the existence of the general principle, but it is not in terms laid down that any such principle exists, and that case was decided by CLEASBY, B., on the ground that the negligence of the defendant, which was his own personal negligence, was equivalent, for the purposes of the action, to fraud, on which, as he said, the decision in Langridge v. Levy (1) was based.

G In declining to concur in laying down the principle enunciated by the Master of the Rolls, I in no way intimate any doubt as to the principle that anyone who leaves a dangerous instrument, such as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who, without due warning, supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger not necessarily incident to the use of such instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act. For the reasons stated I agree that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, though I do not entirely concur with the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls.

Negligence—Adjoining premises—Duty of owner of premises to neighbour—Dangerous work—Exercise of reasonable skill and care—Right to take indemnity from contractor.

A person who does work on his land which exposes his neighbour to risk is not an insurer of his neighbour and does not warrant him against damage to his premises, but he is required to see that reasonable skill and care are exercised in the operations which expose the neighbour to risk and that every reasonable precaution is taken to protect the neighbour's property from damage. He cannot get rid of his responsibility by delegating its performance to a third person. He is at liberty to employ such a third person to fulfil the duty which the law casts on himself and can take an indemnity in case of mischief coming from that person not fulfilling that duty, but he remains subject to that duty and liable for the consequences if it is not fulfilled. He must be vigilant and careful, for he is liable for injury to his neighbour caused by any want of prudence or precaution, even though it may be culpa levissima.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BAGGALLAY and BRETT, L.JJ., HOLKER, L.J., dissenting), reported 9 Q.B.D. 441, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., MANISTY and BOWEN, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a new trial.

The action was brought by the respondent against the appellant to recover damages for negligence under the following circumstances. The appellant was the owner of two houses at the corner of Panton Street and the Haymarket, London, abutting on the east on a house of the respondent in Panton Street, and on the south on a house in the Haymarket belonging to one Barron. The appellant wished to pull down his houses and to erect a new house on the site, and he employed a competent architect to prepare plans and to superintend the work, and a competent builder to carry it out. In the course of the operations girders to support the appellant's new house were fixed into the party wall between his house and that of the respondent. When the work was nearly completed some of the contractor's workmen, who were employed in fixing a staircase, cut into the party wall between the appellant's house and Barron's for that purpose. This act was not permitted by the plans or specifications and was objected to by the architect when he discovered it. The wall was old and rotten and gave way, and in consequence the girders which had been fixed in the other party wall were let down, and that wall and the respondent's house were damaged. The case came on for trial before MANISTY, J., and a special jury, and at the conclusion of the opening address of the appellant's counsel the learned judge said that, even if all that had been opened were proved it would be no defence to the action, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The appellant obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, which was discharged, and the appellant's appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed.

Philbrick, Q.C., and Kingsford for the appellant.

Webster, Q.C., and M'Call for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 4, 1883. The following opinions were read.

A

LORD BLACKBURN.—This is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal dismissing an appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division discharging a rule obtained by the defendant to enter judgment on the ground that the judge ought to have directed a verdict for the defendant, or that there should be a new trial.

B

The first point to be considered is: What was the relation in which the defendant stood to the plaintiff? It was admitted that the parties were owners of adjoining houses between which was a party wall, the property of both. The defendant pulled down his house and had it re-built on a plan which involved in it the tying together of the new building and the party wall which was between the plaintiff's house and the defendant's, so that if one fell the other would be damaged. The defendant had a right so to utilise the party wall, for it was his property as well as the plaintiff's; a stranger would not have had such a right. But I think the law cast upon the defendant, when exercising this right, a duty towards the plaintiff. I do not think that duty went so far as to require him absolutely to provide that no damage should come to the plaintiff's wall from the use he thus made of it, but I think that the duty went so far as to require him to see that reasonable skill and care were exercised in those operations which involved a use of the party wall, exposing it to this risk. If such a duty were cast upon the defendant he could not get rid of the responsibility by delegating the performance of it to a third person. He was at liberty to employ such a third person to fulfil the duty which the law cast on himself, and, if they so agreed together, to take an indemnity to himself in case of mischief coming from that person not fulfilling the duty which the law cast upon the defendant; but the defendant still remained subject to that duty and liable for the consequences if it was not fulfilled.

This is the law, I think, clearly laid down in Pickard v. Smith (2) and finally in Dalton v. Angus (3). But in all the cases on the subject there was a duty cast by law on the party who was held liable. In Dalton v. Angus (3) and in Bower v. Peate (4) the defendants had caused an interference with the plaintiff's right of support. COCKBURN, C.J., it is true in Bower v. Peate (4), after showing this, says (1 Q.B.D. at p. 326):

H

"The answer to the defendant's contention may, however, as it appears to us, be placed on a proper ground, namely, that a man who orders a work to be executed, from which, in the natural course of things, injurious consequences to his neighbour must be expected to arise unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, is bound to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief, and cannot relieve himself of his responsibility by employing someone else—whether it be the contractor employed to do the work from which the danger arises, or some independent person—to do what is necessary to prevent the act he has ordered to be done from becoming wrongful."

I doubt whether this is not too broadly stated. If taken in the full sense of the words, it would seem to render a person who orders post horses and a coachman from an inn bound to see that the coachman, though not his servant, but that of the innkeeper, used that skill and care which is necessary when driving the coach to prevent mischief to the passengers. But the Court of Queen's Bench had no intention, and, indeed not being a court of error, had no power to alter, the law laid down in Quarman v. Burnett (5).

I

If I am right in thinking that the defendant, in consequence of his using the party wall of which the plaintiff was part owner, had a duty cast upon him by law similar to that which in Dalton v. Angus (3) it was held was cast upon the defendant in that case, in consequence of his using the foundations on which the plaintiff had a right of support, it is not necessary now to inquire how far

A this general language should be qualified. I do not think Butler v. Hunter (1) is consistent with my view of the law. I do not know whether the Court of Exchequer meant to deny that such a duty was cast upon the defendant in that case, or meant to say that he might escape liability by employing a contractor. If either was meant by the Court of Exchequer I am obliged to differ from them.

B If this be so, the question is, I think, narrowed to this: Was the operation during which the defendant's duty required him to see that reasonable skill and care should be used over at the time when those engaged in the work cut into the party wall between the defendant's house and Barron's, for it is not disputed that there was a want of skill in doing this and that it caused the damage, and it is not disputed that the men who did it were intending to carry out the work on which they were employed. The defence opened at the trial, I think, was directed to this, that the contractor was bound not to do anything without written authority, and that there was no authority at all to cut into the party wall. I do not think that that could prevent the act which was done from being in breach of the defendant's duty. HOLKER, L.J., however, thought as I understand him, that the whole of the operation connected with the use of the plaintiff's party wall were over, and that the contractor's men were engaged in a subsequent independent job, and that the defendant was under no further duty than he would have been if, after the house was finished, he had brought in carpenters to repair a wooden staircase. I cannot, however, take this view. I regret that the case was stopped in the counsel's opening, for I feel convinced that if the evidence had been gone into this view of the facts could not have been taken. As it is, I do not think it necessary to say more of the view of the law taken by the late lord justice [HOLKER, L.J.] than that I think it well worthy of consideration in any case where the facts are as he seemed to suppose. I think that the order appealed against should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—In this case I have had great difficulty in forming an opinion satisfactory to my own mind, not because of any doubts as to the law, but because I do feel doubtful whether I rightly apprehend the facts which I ought to assume as the basis of my judgment. It is very much to be regretted that the case was not submitted to the jury. Had that course been followed it is certain that the facts would have been ascertained, and it is highly probable that no question of law would have arisen. As it is we are left to discover the facts upon which our judgment must depend from a very long and argumentative statement made by the appellant's counsel, and in regard to the true import of that statement the parties at the Bar widely differed. Accordingly, we heard quite as much argument about the meaning of what was said to the jury as upon the law of the case. In the Court of Appeal the result of this unsatisfactory state of matters was that HOLKER, L.J., took a somewhat different view of the facts from his colleagues, which led him to a different result in law. Had your Lordships not thought otherwise, I should have been inclined to send the case back to the jury for their determination.

H It is, in my opinion, neither satisfactory nor expedient to decide important questions of law upon a hypothetical statement of facts, especially when the litigant parties are not agreed as to the meaning of the statement. Here the appellant says that his counsel meant to indicate to the jury that he was about to prove, or would try to prove certain facts; the respondent, on the other hand, says that the statement of the appellant's counsel, when carefully read and construed, indicates that he meant to prove something materially different from those facts. I feel a great dislike to criticising the oral statements of a counsel as if they were part of the record, and conceive that I am bound to construe them most liberally in favour of his client. I rather think that HOLKER, L.J., must have been to some extent influenced by these considerations in putting a different construction upon the language from that which was adopted by the other members of the Court of Appeal.

Although I do not agree with the view taken by him, I am not certain that I A take precisely the same view of the facts with your Lordships, and it is on that account that I have thought it necessary to explain the grounds upon which I have come to the same result. I agree with your Lordships that it was the duty of the appellant, in carrying out his building operations, to see that reasonable precautions were taken in order to protect from injury the eastern wall of his tenement, of which the respondent was part owner. The appellant does not deny B that many of the operations which he contemplated, and had employed a contractor to execute, were such as would necessarily, or possibly, imperil the stability of the party wall if no precautions were used, nor does he dispute that it was encumbered upon him to see that these operations were safely carried out by the contractor. What he did allege and offer to prove before the jury was that all these hazardous operations had been brought to a safe termination months before the occurrence which resulted in damage to the respondent's house. Looking to the terms of the contract and specification I think it does appear that extensive structural operations, fraught with obvious risk to the party wall in question, had been carefully and successfully executed, and if I had been able to come to the conclusion in fact, that after these were completed, there remained nothing to be done by the contractor which would reasonably be supposed to involve D danger to the party wall, I should have been disposed to agree with HOLKER, L.J.

I do not think that the combination in one contract of operations hazardous and operations in no reasonable sense hazardous does affect the character of those operations, or impose upon the employer legal duties and liabilities to which he would not have been subject had he employed a different contractor for each operation. But I am not satisfied that the fitting up of a wooden staircase from the basement floor of the appellant's tenement to the cellar below, was an operation which could occasion no risk to the party wall. It was an operation which might be executed in at least two ways, either by cutting a groove in the south party wall, and inserting in it one of the wooden stringers supporting the stair, or by leaving the wall untouched and fixing the staircase outside it. I see no reason to doubt that the latter method would have been unattended with danger to the wall against which the stair was to be placed, or to the party wall in which the respondent is interested. The other method was, as the result showed, attended with serious danger to both these walls, and I cannot find any suggestion in the statement made by the appellant's counsel to the effect that no one could have reasonably anticipated that a workman might cut the wall in order to let in a stringer.
The statement which was very strongly and repeatedly made regarding it was that the cutting of the wall was unnecessary and was not only unauthorised but positively forbidden. Unnecessary it certainly was, because the staircase might have been securely fixed without interfering with the wall. Unauthorised and forbidden it also was in this sense, that by the terms of the contract and relative specification the contractor was bound to leave the wall untouched. But the terms of the contract and specification are, in my opinion, of no relevancy as in a question with the respondent. E
H

If there were any reason to suppose that an ordinary workman entrusted with the job might cut into the wall, the appellant took a very proper precaution when he bound his contractor not to cut it, but he failed in his duty to the respondent when he permitted the contractor and his workmen to neglect that precaution.
I am of opinion that the appellant could not establish a good defence to the respondent's claim by simply proving that it was not in the least necessary to cut the wall, and that the contractor was under an obligation not to do it. It appears to me that he could not escape from liability unless he further proved that it could not have been reasonably anticipated that any workman of ordinary skill in such operations, who was neither insane nor dishonest, would have dreamt of cutting the wall. I can find no allegation to that effect, nor do the statements made by the appellant's counsel appear to me to sustain the inference that the cutting of the wall was an act of that improbable description. It is not said I

A that the contractor's workmen were deficient in ordinary skill, or that their act, however ill-judged, was dictated by any other motive than a desire to perform their work efficiently.

B In these circumstances the only inference in fact which I can draw is, that these men ought to have been specially directed not to interfere with the wall, and that care should have been taken that they obeyed the direction. These precautions ought, no doubt, to have been taken by the contractor, but, in accordance with the principle laid down in Bower v. Peate (4) and Dalton v. Angus (3), it was no less the duty of the appellant, as in a question with the respondent, to see that they were strictly observed.

C LORD FITZGERALD.—The question in the case seems to me rather one of controverted fact than of law. The defendant did not endeavour to escape from the principles to be deduced from Dalton v. Angus (3), Tarry v. Ashton (6), Bower v. Peate (4) and Pickard v. Smith (2), or to deny their applicability; and, on the other hand, the plaintiff's counsel admitted the law as stated by the defendant's counsel.

D If for the defendant it was contended that the work on which he was engaged, if originally hazardous, had ceased to be so, inasmuch as all that was hazardous had been completed, and that the particular work which was being done was not dangerous in itself, or likely to produce danger, and that the wrongful or negligent act of the workman, which it was said caused the calamity, was entirely collateral, and wholly unauthorised. I agree with LORD BLACKBURN in regretting the course taken at the trial, for I cannot help thinking that, if the evidence had been fully gone into, we should probably not have heard of the case. We are now obliged E to take our view of the facts from the opening statement of the defendant's counsel at the trial, and I have considerable doubt whether the real cause of the fall of the plaintiff's new house is not traceable to another and different source than that which has been assumed, and which, if ascertained as a matter of fact, might have exonerated the contractor, and rendered clear the liability of the defendant. F

G The undertaking the defendant was engaged on was, no doubt, as a whole perilous to his neighbours on both sides, and such as to render care and precaution necessary at every step until the whole of the new structure was substantially completed, or so far at least that nothing remained to be done which could affect the stability of either of the party walls. Part of the original design was that the party wall at Barron's side should be taken down and re-built from top to bottom. Thus we find that the specification provides :

"The contractor to take down the party wall of adjoining building in the Hay-market, and cut away all the old bricks and rubbish, grub up old foundations, and prepare levels for re-building new party wall."

H The defendant's counsel, in one part of his statement, said :

I "I ought to mention to you one very important fact, and it is this. There was the party wall which stood between Barron's house and the house here, which was to be re-built by Mr. Hughes [the appellant]. This party wall it was proposed, and assented to by Mr. Hughes, on these plans and specifications, should be entirely taken down and re-built. Mr. Hughes would have to be at the expense of doing so, because he was the building owner."

In place of carrying out the specification the plan was departed from as to this old party wall; it was underpinned, and then up to the first floor, about fourteen feet, left untouched, but from that point upwards a new party wall was built on it, and necessarily of greater height and greater weight than the old wall. It was the old portion of this party wall which gave way, and by its fall caused the fall of the defendant's house, and the displacement of the girder which was clinched into the plaintiff's party wall, and caused the mischief of which he complains. If Barron's wall had been entirely re-built, as it ought to have been,

it is not at all probable that the calamity would have occurred. A new brick wall has great cohesive power, and, as it would be smooth no chipping or hacking would be necessary to fit on the stairs, and it would probably be unaffected by chipping or hacking, and even cutting into it to fit the wooden staircase or stone steps would not affect its stability so as to create danger. As to the old wall it was different; it was of unknown antiquity, and the part that was left seems to have been weak, out of plumb, with an uneven and rough front, which, according to specification, was to be hacked off and levelled, and it had a great superincumbent weight of new work placed on it. It yielded from its inherent weakness to the cutting and shaking it received in the process of fixing the wooden and stone steps and came down.

It is thus described :

"Then from the first floor up to the second floor, it was intended to have a flight of stone steps, the ends to be let into the wall from which they depend, pinned into the wall; that involves of course cutting into the wall a sufficient depth, and plugging up the holes, after you have got the end of the step in. But they began at the bottom, and got the bottom step with the door on the floor morticed or let into the wall, pinning it into the wall properly at one end and filling that up with cement, and then the next step is fixed above it, and the next above that, and so you go on according to the slope at which your staircase rises. The men were fixing on the day of the accident this flight of stone steps. But independently of that the men who were employed by the carpenters were also fixing a flight of steps which led down into the basement, wooden steps, and without any knowledge of the foreman of the works, and without any order from him, without any knowledge at all of either of the architects, or anything shown on the plans to that effect or prescribed in the specification, the workman had, on his own head, and, as it were, utterly unauthorised, cut into the wall below the level of the ground floor, that is to say, the lower portion of the party wall which had been left."

The fall is described :

"The whole appeared to collapse in the centre, to go down, no doubt partly or chiefly put in motion by the fact that this party wall had been by the unauthorised act of the workmen unduly and improperly weakened; that had set the thing going and the girder gave way, the wall gave way, and the collapse took place as I have described."

The act of the workmen may have been unauthorised and ill-judged, but it was an act no doubt done in the execution of the work entrusted to them, and can in no sense be said to have been entirely collateral; and it is not to be forgotten that the contract provides that

"complete copies of the drawings and specifications are to be kept in the buildings in charge of a competent foreman, who is to be constantly kept on the ground by the contractors, and to whom instructions can be given by the architect," who, of course, is to direct the workmen in their operations, and ought to see that what they are doing is necessary and lawful, and carried out in the safest manner.

Was the perilous portion of the work completed before the doing of the act which it is said led immediately to the fall of Barron's party wall, and the consequent injuries to the plaintiff's house? I should have answered that question in the negative without any hesitation if it had not been for the opinion expressed by HOLKER, L.J., which I receive with the utmost respect. The event shows that the danger was not over, and I should have thought that it could not be as long as anything was being done that could affect the stability of either party wall. HOLKER, L.J., seems to have been of opinion that, though the operation as a whole

A was perilous, yet that the peril had ceased, though the work was not completed. He says, as to the particular portion of the work :

“It seems to me perfectly clear that it was not hazardous work, and the workmen exceeded their duty; they made a mistake.”

B But is it open to us to divide the work thus into sections, and to say as to a particular part taken by itself that it carried with it no special peril, and that the defendant is not responsible? It seems to me this cannot be done. We should not be justified in thus breaking it into parts, or considering the case as if the putting in the stairs or the stone steps was the sole work which the defendant was getting done.

C The conclusion I have reached is that the defendant had undertaken a work which, as a whole, necessarily carried with it considerable peril to his neighbours. In the execution of that work the party wall at Barron's side was so injured that it fell in, and its fall dragged down the new building, and injured the plaintiff's party wall and premises. What is the law applicable? What was the defendant's duty? The law has been verging somewhat in the direction of treating parties engaged in such an operation as the defendant as insurers of their neighbours, or warranting them against injury. It has not, however, reached quite to that point. It does declare that under such a state of circumstances it was the duty of the defendant to have used every reasonable precaution that care and skill might suggest in the execution of his works so as to protect his neighbours from injury, and that he cannot get rid of the responsibility thus cast on him by transferring that duty to another. He is not in the actual position of being responsible for injury no matter how occasioned, but he must be vigilant and careful, for he is liable for injuries to his neighbours caused by any want of prudence or precaution, even though it may be culpa levissima. It seems to me that the peril to the plaintiff's house continued as long as there remained anything to be done which could interfere with the stability of the girder on which the defendant's house rested, which the defendant had fastened into the plaintiff's party wall, and that there was that want of due supervision and due precaution which makes the defendant liable.

Appeal dismissed.

HARVEY v. FARNIE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (The Earl of Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson), November 29, 30, 1882]

[Reported 8 App. Cas. 43; 52 L.J.P. 33; 48 L.T. 273; 47 J.P. 308;
31 W.R. 433]

Conflict of Laws—Marriage—Dissolution under foreign law—Marriage solemnised in England—Husband a foreigner—Residence of parties in country of husband's domicile—Wife granted divorce in that country on ground not ground of divorce in England.

Where a marriage has been duly solemnised according to the local law of the place of solemnisation, the wife no longer retains any other domicile than that of the husband. Where, therefore, an Englishwoman married in England, according to English law, a foreigner with a foreign domicile, and resided with him in the country of his domicile abroad,

Held: the courts of the country of the husband's domicile had power to dissolve the marriage on a ground on which a divorce could not have been granted in England, and a decree of divorce on that ground would be recognised in England.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (JAMES, COTTON and LUSH, L.JJ.), reported 6 P.D. 35, affirming a decision of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., reported 5 P.D. 153, dismissing a petition for a declaration of nullity of marriage.

In 1861 the respondent, J. B. Farnie, married in England an Englishwoman according to the forms of English law. He was then a domiciled Scot, and after the marriage he continued to live in Scotland with his wife. In 1863 a decree of divorce was pronounced against him by the Scottish court at the suit of his wife, upon grounds which would not have been sufficient to sustain a petition for divorce in England. He then settled in England, and in 1865 he married the appellant, then a Miss Harvey, in England, and has continued to live there. His first wife was still living at the date of his second marriage, and this petition was brought by the second wife for a declaration of nullity, on the ground that the Scottish decree of divorce was not binding in England.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—This case has been argued by the learned counsel for the appellant at considerable length, and the legal principle involved in it is not new to your Lordships. If it were not that there has been much consideration and discussion, if not in cases in specie exactly resembling the present, yet in cases involving principles bearing upon the present, I have no doubt that your Lordships would have desired to hear the case fully argued on both sides; but, looking to the nature of this particular case, and to the state of authority upon the subject, I believe your Lordships are all of opinion that it is not necessary to call upon the counsel for the respondent here.

F

The ground upon which this Scottish divorce is impeached appears to be this and this alone—that by the law of England a divorce for such a cause (adultery) as was alleged here is only granted at the suit of the husband, except under particular circumstances which in this case do not appear to have existed. The husband's adultery, without anything more, would not in England be a ground of divorce. It is a ground of divorce in Scotland; and this divorce was upon such a ground at the suit of the wife. The circumstances under which this divorce was obtained, were these. The marriage had been solemnised in England, but at the time of the marriage the husband was domiciled in Scotland. That matrimonial domicile was never changed. The husband and wife lived in Scotland, the adultery was committed in Scotland, and when both parties were resident there the suit for divorce was instituted in Scotland, and a decree was regularly pronounced in those circumstances by the Scottish courts. The judge of the Divorce Court and the Court of Appeal have both held that, under those circumstances, the sentence of divorce not being impeached for any species of collusion or fraud, was the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, not only effectual within that jurisdiction, but entitled to recognition in the courts of this country also. On the other side it has been contended that there is a general rule of English law supposed to have been established in R. v. Lolley (2), and not to have been since departed from in such a way as to make it now otherwise than binding on this House, to the effect that, if an Englishwoman is married within the limits of the English jurisdiction to a foreigner (a Scotsman being for this purpose in the same position with a foreigner), that is a marriage which the English courts must regard as indissoluble by any other than an English jurisdiction; or if not that, at all events only dissoluble in the view of an English court, if dissolved by some other competent jurisdiction for a cause for which it might have been dissolved in England. A

H

I

I must take the liberty of saying that, if this question is to be tested upon principle apart from authority, although it cannot be denied that the varying jurisprudence, and perhaps legislation also, of different countries may and do introduce some undesirable cases of conflict between the laws of those different countries on questions of matrimonial status, yet, if the question is to be approached on principle, I should certainly say that in such circumstances as those which exist in the present case all the principles of private international law point in the direction of the validity of such a sentence and of its recognition by the courts of other countries. Of course I assume that in the way of that recognition on the principle of international law, there would not be interposed any positive legislation bearing upon the point, or any positive prohibition binding upon the court in which the question arises. B C

Upon the point of principle how does the matter stand? Let it be granted (and I think it is well settled) that the general rule internationally recognised as to the constitution of marriage is that, when there is no personal incapacity attaching upon either party or upon the particular party who is to be regarded by the law to which he is personally subject, that is, the law of his own country, then marriage is held to be constituted everywhere, if it is well constituted secundum legem loci contractus; but that merely determines what in all these cases is the point you start from. When a marriage has been duly solemnised according to the local law of the place of solemnisation, the parties do become husband and wife. But when they become husband and wife, what is the character which the wife assumes? She becomes the wife of the foreign husband in a case where the husband is a foreigner in the country in which the marriage is contracted. She no longer retains any other domicile than his which she acquires. The marriage is contracted with a view to that matrimonial domicile which results from her placing herself by contract in the relation of wife to the husband whom she marries knowing him to be a foreigner domiciled and contemplating permanent and settled residence abroad. D E

Therefore, it must be within the meaning of such a contract, if we are to inquire into it, that she is to become subject to her husband's law, subject in respect of the consequences of the matrimonial relation and of all other consequences depending upon the law of the husband's domicile. That would appear to be so upon principle, and that principle followed out would certainly apply in a case like this, where the domicile into which she has married has never undergone a change, where there has been no divergence of cohabitation or residence, and where the crime was committed in the country both of the domicile and of the forum. It would appear that, if this question is to depend on any principle at all, it must be upon the principle of recognising the law of the forum and matrimonial domicile, which in this case both concur. F G

That being my view of the plain and clear conclusion to which we shall be driven upon this subject, let us see how the matter stands upon the authorities. There are a number of different cases which may be mentioned, and may be distinguished from each other; but, as far as I know, there are only two or three cases in which an appeal has been made to this House which present concurrently all the circumstances relied upon for the foundation of the jurisdiction in the present case. H

It is said that those circumstances existed in M'Carthy v. Decaix (1), because there the solemnisation of the marriage was also in England, but the husband was a Dane. As far as I recollect, the parties lived together in Denmark as long as they lived together at all, and in the courts of Denmark, while they both lived there, a sentence of divorce was pronounced. That sentence was not for a cause which, even under the present law, would be recognised in England. It was for what abroad I think is called—or at least that is our English translation of the foreign legal term—incompatibility of temper. But, except as to the nature of the cause of the divorce, that case would seem in its original facts to have been like the present. It is said that LORD BROUGHAM in M'Carthy v. Decaix (1) decided that. I

A because the solemnisation of the marriage with an Englishwoman had taken place in England, therefore the Danish court could not under those circumstances dissolve the marriage. I have great respect for the judicial decisions of all who have at any time filled the office of Lord Chancellor. I have great respect, also, for the high reputation of LORD BROUGHAM; but I am compelled to speak without great respect of the decision in M'Carthy v. Decaix (1), because not only does it appear to me to proceed upon a view of R. v. Lolley (2) which is not tenable, but also it is a decision which, upon principles universally recognised, would be incapable of being supported, even if it were true that the English court ought not to have recognised that Danish divorce, because, beyond all doubt on that supposition, both the husband and the wife lived and died domiciled in Denmark, and the distribution of both their personal estates would, by a law which is beyond controversy, fall to be regulated in England and everywhere by the law of Denmark and not by the law of England. Therefore, unless it had been ascertained that the law of Denmark under those circumstances would not distribute those estates in the same manner as if there had been a valid divorce, the decision manifestly lost sight of the true question in the cause.

D I do not, therefore, think it necessary to say more about M'Carthy v. Decaix (1). It has been commented upon on various occasions in a manner certainly tending to shake its authority; but, to my mind, nothing more is necessary entirely to destroy its authority than to bear in mind the fact that, even if the English courts ought to have declined to recognise in that case the Danish divorce, still the English courts could not with propriety have applied the English law to the case, because the distribution of the movable property in question depended entirely upon Danish law, and the English courts were bound to treat it as depending upon Danish law. Therefore M'Carthy v. Decaix (1) may be put aside.

E I am not quite sure, but I think that in Geils v. Geils (3) the circumstances were also parallel with those of the present case, because there, if I am not mistaken, not only was the Scottish matrimonial domicile unchanged at the time of the divorce, but I think the adultery was committed in Scotland, and I think at the time of the action brought both parties were resident in Scotland. In that case the decision of the Scottish court was upheld upon an appeal from Scotland to this House. No doubt, that by itself does not show that an English court ought to have also recognised the validity of the decision; but, having regard to what has constantly fallen from the judges who in this House have determined questions of that kind with reference to general principles, I think the presumption rather is that an English court ought, unless some reason which at present I am unable to perceive be shown to the contrary, to recognise the decision of a Scottish court in a case in which this House has held that the Scottish court had proper jurisdiction to pass such a sentence.

G The third case is Maghee v. M'Allister (4), a case in Ireland before BLACKBURNE, L.C. There, as in the Danish case, the cause of divorce was one which would not be sufficient in England, desertion and non-adherence, but the parties there also had been from the first matrimonially and actually domiciled in Scotland. They were not both in Scotland when the action was brought, and that makes it stronger. I rather think that the cause of action arose out of the fact that the wife had withdrawn herself, and she was elsewhere.

H I Nevertheless, the jurisdiction was upheld on the same principles on which this House upheld the Scottish jurisdiction in Warrender v. Warrender (5), where the matrimonial domicile had all along been Scottish, but the crime was alleged to have been committed out of Scotland, and the wife was resident there; still this House held, in a Scottish appeal undoubtedly, that the Scottish court had proper jurisdiction; and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, under circumstances similar in principle, held that an Irish court ought upon principle, according to the comity of nations, to recognise the competency of the Scottish jurisdiction to pronounce the divorce which had been pronounced in Maghee v. M'Allister (4).

I believe that those are the only cases which are in their circumstances exactly like the present case. Much of illustration and of valuable and important doctrine is undoubtedly to be found in other authorities. I will just glance at some of those authorities in order to see precisely what they do and what they do not determine. I will begin with R. v. Lolley (2). What was R. v. Lolley (2)? It was a case of this class, that persons who had married, and had always been and always continued to be matrimonially and actually domiciled in England, had recourse to Scotland for the purpose of constituting a merely collusive domicile, and there obtained a divorce for a crime, I take it, committed in Scotland. It was held by the English courts that that was not a valid sentence. I do not think that there was certainly any very great hardship upon Mr. Lolley, the husband, because whether there was collusion on the part of his wife or not, it is quite certain that he went through the whole proceeding in order to get rid of his wife and marry another woman, with whom he had already entered into a conditional engagement. But there was a total absence of matrimonial or actual domicile. We need not consider whether a change of domicile would or would not have been sufficient. The domicile was throughout English, and the recourse to Scotland was merely for the purpose of getting rid of the marriage. That case decided, and every subsequent case is consistent with the decision, that in those circumstances the Scottish court had no proper jurisdiction, or at all events not such a jurisdiction as could be recognised as giving any effect to its sentence in England.

There arose a somewhat similar question in Tovey v. Lindsay (6), and it is remarkable that there LORD ELDON did, in the course of the argument, once or twice before he came to deliver judgment, express himself in terms not different from the terms used at your Lordships' Bar, by the learned counsel for the appellant, as to the point decided in R. v. Lolley (2). He is reported to have said (1 Dow. at p. 124), that the

"twelve judges had lately decided that, as by the English law marriage was indissoluble, a marriage contracted in England could not be dissolved in any way except by an act of the legislature," which is very much the way in which counsel for the present appellant put it. Again (ibid. at p. 125):

"You say that the marriage ought to be dissolved. Her answer to that is, that being contracted within the pale of the English law, it is indissoluble."

So LORD ELDON during the argument once or twice expressed himself, with regard to R. v. Lolley (2), in the terms of the appellant's argument in this case; but when he came to deliver his judgment, it is quite plain that upon mature consideration he saw reason to take a different view.

The material facts there were these: The original domicile of the husband was Scottish. He had afterwards lived a good deal in England, particularly at Durham. He had separated from his wife. His wife remained in Durham, and he afterwards sued her for a divorce in Scotland, she being out of the jurisdiction, and there being no corpus delicti in Scotland. The Scottish courts had treated it as a confessedly Scottish domicile. LORD ELDON in the whole of his judgment treats domicile as the point upon which the question ought properly to depend; not, however, ultimately deciding anything, and certainly not deciding the very important question which might have arisen if the change to an English domicile had been established, namely, how far a subsequent change of domicile would affect the jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage; but he considered the fact of domicile to be necessary to be ascertained, which, according to the view of R. v. Lolley (2) taken by the appellant's counsel at your Lordships' Bar, could not possibly have been necessary at all. Therefore, I think we may infer very clearly that in LORD ELDON's mind it could not be determined off-hand that the Scottish court had no jurisdiction merely on the ground that the marriage had taken place in England.

Then I come to observe upon two other classes of cases, or rather one other class, because Dolphin v. Robins (7) and Shaw v. Gould (8) seem to me to be very nearly

A the same in their circumstances as R. v. Lolley (2), and I will not, therefore, dwell upon those cases. In the other class of cases is Niboyet v. Niboyet (9), where the forum which dissolved the marriage was not that of the matrimonial domicile, but was that of the bona fide residence of both parties, both being within the jurisdiction, and the crime having been committed there. If that case was well decided, it is not certainly an authority in the appellant's favour, because it goes to this length, B that, at all events under the English statute, if those circumstances are found concurring, even domicile is not necessary to give jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage. Whether or not another country, in that case the country of the parties (France), would have recognised that decision we need not at present inquire, because either it is applicable on the present occasion, or it is not. If it is applicable, it is certainly an authority against the appellant; if it is not applicable, it does not C help her.

Pitt v. Pitt (10) no doubt was a case which did not unite the circumstances which your Lordships have to consider here, because, in Pitt v. Pitt (10), in which this House on an appeal from Scotland reversed an order which had affirmed the jurisdiction of the Scottish court, and, therefore, determined that the court had no jurisdiction, the circumstances were these. The matrimonial domicile was English, D the solemnisation of the marriage was in England. Mr. Pitt, the husband, had gone to Scotland. It was in controversy whether he had there acquired an actual domicile or not, but it was decided that he had not. He, therefore, retained his English domicile. The wife was not in Scotland, and the alleged adultery was not committed in Scotland. In those circumstances the House came to the opposite decision from that which it had arrived at in Warrender v. Warrender (5), the circumstances being very parallel, except that in the one case there was, and in the other there was not, a Scottish domicile. In Warrender v. Warrender (5), where E there was a Scottish domicile, the jurisdiction was upheld, though the crime had not been committed in Scotland, and though the wife, who was the defender, was not resident in Scotland. In Pitt v. Pitt (10) the jurisdiction was denied, because there was not a Scottish domicile, the other circumstances being the same.

F I do not say that Pitt v. Pitt (10) would of necessity govern cases like Niboyet v. Niboyet (9), for example, if they were to arise in Scotland. That is not a question which your Lordships have now to determine, and it is not desirable that you should go beyond the case which you have to determine; but this I will say, without going through all the cases which have been cited, that when they are carefully G examined you find that the current of the best authority which pervades them is in favour of regarding and not disregarding international principles upon this subject, when you do not find the positive law of the country where the forum is in conflict with those principles, unless M'Carthy v. Decaix (1) may be considered to be an exception. The present decision in the Court of Appeal is in accordance with H international law and with the whole stream of sound authority, including LORD LYNTHURST, LORD BROUGHAM himself (though no doubt from the view which he took of R. v. Lolley (2) he not infrequently contended against it in terms which your Lordships probably would not unreservedly adopt), LORD ST. LEONARDS, LORD WESTBURY, LORD CRANWORTH, LORD CHELMSFORD, and LORD KINGSDOWN, all of whom concur. I have no hesitation in saying that, from the passages which have been read from the judgments of each and every one of those noble and learned I Lords, I should confidently infer that, if the present case had been argued before all or any one of them, they would have concurred in the judgment which I now move your Lordships to pronounce, which is, that the present appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I agree in almost everything that has been said, and I should hardly consider it necessary to add anything if it were not that I wish to point out that the only question that we have to decide at present is that in this case the divorce was good, that the court in Scotland had, under the circumstances of this case, the proper power to divorce, and that that divorce put an end to the marriage. Several cases were cited and arguments used for the purpose of showing that in some cases a divorce might not have been good where there was not so much ground for it as there is here. That, I apprehend we have not to consider. It is no objection to this being a good divorce and putting an end to the marriage in this case to say that there might be cases in which the facts did not go so far and in which a divorce might not be good according to some of the decisions. That would not affect the present decision, which is that in the present case there is enough to do it.

Let us now see what the present case is. A Scotsman domiciled in Scotland, and being to all intents and purposes a Scotsman, comes to England, and there marries an English wife. She was an Englishwoman up to the moment of her marriage. The marriage took place in England according to the forms of English law, and from the moment of her marriage she became a domiciled Scotswoman, just as her husband was a domiciled Scotsman. There was nothing whatever to change that domicile; and while they were both in Scotland there was a divorce by a Scottish court from the marriage, a dissolution a vinculo matrimonii on the particular ground of an offence committed in Scotland. The question is: Is that divorce good in England? Is it according to English law that a dissolution of marriage by a Scottish court under those circumstances is a good dissolution of marriage in England? Whether it would have been good in Scotland or not would not have been the same question. I can easily suppose that there might be good divorces in Scotland that would not be good in England. Seeing that there was this complete domicile, which almost every writer and speaker upon the subject has regarded as certainly the most important element in considering what the status of married people and the status of those divorced from a marriage is, this was in its origin a Scottish domicile from the very beginning.

The only ground upon which it has been said that a Scottish court could not divorce the parties was that the actual marriage contract was made in England. I do not myself see why, upon any principle, that should make any difference. What was urged was that there was authority for that proposition, and for that purpose R. v. Lolley (2) was cited. LORD BROUGHAM did more than once cite and act upon R. v. Lolley (2), as though he had understood it as going to the full extent of what I have just said—that the fact that a marriage was contracted locally in England made it an English marriage, and, therefore, indissoluble by any foreign court on the ground of adultery or anything else. LORD BROUGHAM appears to have thought that that was the decision in R. v. Lolley (2), but I think that that was not the decision. When you look at the facts in R. v. Lolley (2) they are clear. An English husband married an English wife in England; he was a domiciled Englishman, she was a domiciled Englishwoman. They continued to be domiciled Englishman and Englishwoman down to the moment when, going into Scotland for a temporary purpose, he committed adultery there, and she caused him to be divorced in a Scottish court.

In that state of facts the point which was decided by the twelve judges upon the point being brought forward was this. They said they could not and would not inquire into whether there was fraud or not, because if there had been any fraud it ought to have been left to a jury to find it and fraud was not left to a jury; but they did find upon the very point that was brought before them, that there was an English domicile throughout the whole period of the case, and when they decided that an "English marriage," which I think was the phrase that was used, was indissoluble by a foreign court, I think they meant an English marriage where the domicile was English from the beginning to the end of the transaction. LORD BROUGHAM did not understand it so, and more than once in his anger against R. v. Lolley (2) he was inclined to maintain that it was decided upon the ground of the contract being English, and to drive it to absurd results, a reductio ad absurdum, to show that the decision, as he understood it was wrong. But there is no case that I am aware of which says that R. v. Lolley (2) as I have just put it

A is not right. There is no case which, either in Scotland or in this country, decides finally that even in Scotland a divorce under such circumstances as those of R. v. Lolley (2) would not be good. Whether upon the authorities it might not be decided hereafter (it has not yet been decided) that a divorce in Scotland in such circumstances as those of R. v. Lolley (2) would not be valid even by Scottish law, is a point which does not arise in the present case, and one upon which I wish to

B express no opinion either one way or the other. Assuming that in R. v. Lolley (2) the divorce would be good in Scotland, it would be, to my mind, a very uncomfortable result that it should be good in Scotland and bad in England; but that does not, to my mind, prove that this case was not rightly decided. We have not to consider whether or not a divorce under the circumstances of R. v. Lolley (2) would in England be bad; we have to consider whether a divorce under the circum-

C stances of the present case would be bad because it might have been shown to have been void in R. v. Lolley (2) under the circumstances of that case. The validity of the divorce in R. v. Lolley (2) is not the question which is now at all before your Lordships.

Several of the other cases which were cited, such as Niboyet v. Niboyet (9), would only, I think, at the utmost go to this, that there may be grounds (I do not

D inquire whether they would be good or bad grounds) for saying that a divorce may be good and valid in every country, if it is valid in the country where it is pronounced under circumstances that go the length of those in the present case. There was a difference of opinion in Niboyet v. Niboyet (9), and I wish to express no opinion upon it one way or the other; but, supposing it were valid, going even further than

E this case, how can that be an authority for saying that it is not valid when the circumstances only go as far as they do here? I need not repeat what has been said with regard to LORD BROUGHAM's expressions. I can only say that, weighing them, not as authorities binding upon me, but merely as expressions of LORD BROUGHAM's opinion, his reasoning in the cases which have been cited does not

F carry much weight or influence in my mind, and the authority of BLACKBURNE, L.C. (in Maggee v. M'Allister (4)), certainly seems to me to decide exactly the contrary. It appears to me that he was quite right in his decision upon the facts before him, and he gives very good grounds for it. I think his decision is in conformity with all that has been thrown out by various judges at different times. Without going further than that, and without entering into the question and saying whether a bona fide change of a domicile which was originally English would affect

G the question or not, I say that it seems to me that there is no authority except LORD BROUGHAM's against the proper doctrine which was laid down by the court below in the present case, but that there is every authority, except LORD BROUGHAM's, going the other way.

I must observe one thing further. I should have said it, perhaps, a little earlier. I think, when you come to look at the expressions which, in a case decided immediately after R. v. Lolley (2), namely, Tovey v. Lindsay (6), LORD ELDON used with reference to R. v. Lolley (2), you find that, although LORD BROUGHAM had said that it was held that a marriage was indissoluble in Scotland when contracted in England, LORD ELDON, before he came to deliver judgment, said that the decision in R. v. Lolley (2) was that a marriage was indissoluble when it was an English domiciled marriage ab initio down to the time of the divorce. All that was done

I in that case was to send the cause back again to Scotland in order that the Scottish courts might consider with great care before they decided that they had the power to divorce under circumstances which raised such a question as that. It appears that the party died shortly afterwards, and it was not decided then, and I do not think it was ever finally decided by the Scottish courts. At all events, I do not think it would be proper now for your Lordships to form the opinion that that question was decided. I think that all that should be decided here is that upon such facts as are here stated, the Scottish court had power to direct a divorce which should be valid everywhere.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. In this case it is very clear to my mind, and it has not been disputed by the appellant, that, according to the decisions of this House in Scottish appeals, the Court of Session had, under the law of Scotland, jurisdiction to pronounce a sentence of divorce between these parties in December, 1863. But the question which is raised for determination is whether that decree must be respected by the courts of England, or whether it must be set aside as an invalid decree because it dissolves an English marriage.

I must confess that, to my mind, it would be contrary to the plainest principles of international private law, as expounded in a long series of decisions in this House by noble and learned Lords of the highest judicial eminence, from Warrender v. Warrender (5) in 1835 down to Shaw v. Gould (8) in 1868, to give effect to the contention which has been addressed to your Lordships on behalf of the appellant. But then it is said that those principles do not admit of application to the present case because the question falls to be decided, not upon general principles of international law, but upon a certain principle which is peculiar to the law of England. That principle, when explained by the learned counsel for the appellant, is neither more nor less than that, in a case where a marriage takes place in England between a foreigner and an English lady, the law of England regards the place of celebration as fixing within England the jurisdiction, and the only jurisdiction, to dissolve the marriage, and alter the status of the parties from that of married to that of single persons.

For that proposition no authority has been cited either concurrent with, or subsequent to, the long series of decisions to which I have already adverted. But it is said that it was so settled in R. v. Lolley (2), approved of in Tovey v. Lindsay (6), and followed in M'Carthy v. Decaix (1). I agree with every word that has fallen from your Lordships in regard to what was decided in R. v. Lolley (2). I think it is by a mere play upon words that the appellant's counsel has even had a show of plausibility in support of his argument here by using the words "English marriage" which are capable of two very different meanings, either as signifying the substance of the contract or union between the parties out of which their rights as spouses arise, or as signifying the mere place of celebration. I cannot think that, in remitting Tovey v. Lindsay (6), LORD ELDON had in view that it meant merely the place of celebration of the marriage. It is very remarkable, if that was in his Lordship's mind, that he should have remitted the case to the Court of Session to consider, not whether the court in Scotland had power to dissolve a marriage celebrated in England, but whether their judgment was well founded in respect of the domicil of the parties. The only difficulty or doubt upon which the case was remitted was that it appeared to the noble and learned Lord that there was great room for difference of opinion as to the fact of the pursuer being domiciled in Scotland at the time. He asked the judges in Scotland to consider whether he was not really domiciled in Durham, and not in Scotland, as they had assumed in their judgment, and, in the event of their coming to that conclusion in point of fact, he remitted the matter to them with directions carefully to consider the law upon the point.

So far as regards M'Carthy v. Decaix (1), I think that there are considerations arising upon the face of that judgment which render it of little value as an authority. Even if it had been a decision more in point than it seems to me to be I should not have been inclined to follow it in the face of those very weighty observations which have been made by judges, as I have already said, entitled to the highest respect, in subsequent cases. I can only say that throughout the argument in this case I have felt very little doubt as to the result at which your Lordships ought to arrive, because, from beginning to end of that argument it has been a struggle to represent that the words "English marriage" were used throughout these cases, or the more important of them by the judges who used the expression, to designate mere celebration.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Murder—Defence—Necessity to kill to preserve own life—No threat or violence against prisoner.

It is not lawful for any person, in order to save his own life, to kill another when that other is neither attempting or threatening his life nor is guilty of any illegal act of violence towards him. Anyone who kills an innocent and unoffending person to save his own life is guilty of murder.

The two prisoners were indicted for wilful murder, and on the trial the jury returned a special verdict, stating the facts, and referred the matter to the court. The facts stated in the special verdict were substantially as follows: The prisoners, able-bodied English seamen, and the deceased, an English boy between seventeen and eighteen years of age, the crew of an English yacht, were cast away in a storm on the high seas 1,600 miles from land, and were compelled to put into an open boat. The food they took with them was consumed, and, they, having been for eight days without food, and for six days without water, the prisoners killed the boy. The boy when killed was lying at the bottom of the boat, helpless, weak, and unable to make any resistance, and did not assent to his being killed. The prisoners, and another man who was with them, fed upon the body and blood of the boy for four days, when they were picked up by a passing vessel. The verdict went on thus: "If the men had not fed upon the body of the boy, they would probably not have survived to be so picked up and rescued, but would within the four days have died of famine; the boy, being in a much weaker condition, was likely to have died before them; at the time of the act in question there was no sail in sight nor any reasonable prospect of relief; under the circumstances there appeared to the prisoners every probability that, unless they then fed, or very soon fed, upon the boy or one of themselves, they would die of starvation; there was no appreciable chance of saving life except by killing someone for the others to eat; assuming any necessity to kill anybody, there was no greater necessity for killing the boy than any of the three men."

Held: the facts as found afforded no justification for the killing of the boy, and the prisoners were guilty of wilful murder.

Trial adjourned from Exeter Assizes for consideration of the special verdict returned by the jury.

The two prisoners, Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens, were indicted for the wilful murder of Richard Parker on July 25, 1884, on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England. They were tried at the winter assizes at Exeter on Nov. 6, 1884, before HUDDLESTON, B., when, at the suggestion of the learned judge, the jury returned a special verdict, setting out the facts, and referred the matter to the Divisional Court for its decision.

The special verdict was as follows:

"The jurors, upon their oath, say and find that, on July 5, 1884, the prisoners, with one Brooks, all able-bodied English seamen, and the deceased, also an English boy, between seventeen and eighteen years of age, the crew of an English yacht, were cast away in a storm on the high seas, 1,600 miles from the Cape of Good Hope, and were compelled to put into an open boat. That in this boat they had no supply of water and no supply of food, except two 1lb. tins of turnips, and for three days they had nothing else to subsist upon. That on the fourth day they caught a small turtle, upon which they subsisted for a few days, and this was the only food they had up to the twentieth day, when the act now in question was committed. That on the twelfth day the remains of the turtle were entirely consumed, and for the next eight days they had nothing to eat. That they had no fresh water, except such rain as they from time to time caught in their oilskin capes. That the boat was drifting on the ocean, and it was probably more than a thousand miles away from land. That on the eighteenth day, when they had been seven days without food and five without water, the prisoners spoke to Brooks as to what should be done if no succour came, and suggested that someone should be sacrificed to save the rest, but Brooks dissented, and the boy to whom they were understood to refer was not consulted. That on July 24, the day before the act now in question, the prisoner Dudley proposed to Stephens and to Brooks that lots should be cast who should be put to death to save the rest, but Brooks refused to consent, and it was not put to the boy, and in point of fact there was no drawing of lots. That on that day the prisoners spoke of their having families, and suggested that it would be better to kill the boy that their lives should be saved, and the prisoner Dudley proposed that if there was no vessel in sight by the morrow morning the boy should be killed. That next day, July 25, no vessel appearing, Dudley told Brooks that he had better go and have a sleep, and made signs to Stephens and Brooks that the boy had better be killed. The prisoner Stephens agreed to the act, but Brooks dissented from it. That the boy was then lying at the bottom of the boat quite helpless, and extremely weakened by famine and by drinking sea water, and unable to make any resistance, nor did he ever assent to his being killed. The prisoner, Captain Dudley, offered a prayer, asking forgiveness for them all if either of them should be tempted to commit a rash act, and that their souls might be saved. That the prisoner Dudley, with the assent of the prisoner Stephens, went to the boy, and telling him that his time was come, put a knife into his throat and killed him then and there. That the three men fed upon the body and blood of the boy for four days. That, on the fourth day after the act had been committed, the boat was picked up by a passing vessel, and the prisoners were rescued still alive, but in the lowest state of prostration. That they were carried to the port of Falmouth, and committed for trial at Exeter. That, if the men had not fed upon the body of the boy, they would probably not have survived to be so picked up and rescued, but would within the four days have died of famine. That the boy, being in a much weaker condition, was likely to have died before them. That at the time of the act in question there was no sail in sight, nor any reasonable prospect of relief. That under the circumstances there appeared to the prisoners every probability that, unless they then fed, or very soon fed, upon the boy or one of themselves, they would die of starvation. That there was no appreciable chance of saving life except by killing someone for the others to eat. That, assuming any necessity to kill anybody, there was no greater necessity for killing the boy than any of the three men.

"But whether upon the whole matter aforesaid by the said jurors in form aforesaid found the killing of the said Richard Parker by the said Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens done and committed in manner aforesaid be felony and murder or not the said jurors so as aforesaid chosen, tried, and sworn, are ignorant, and pray the advice of the court thereupon. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid by the said jurors in form aforesaid found the court

A shall be of opinion that the aforesaid killing of the said Richard Parker in manner aforesaid done and committed be felony and murder, then the said jurors on their oath say that the said Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens are each guilty of the felony and murder aforesaid in manner and form as in and by the indictment aforesaid above specified is against them alleged. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid by the said jurors in form aforesaid found the court shall be of opinion that the aforesaid killing of the said Richard Parker in manner aforesaid done and committed be not felony and murder, then the jurors aforesaid on their oath aforesaid say that the said Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens are not guilty of the felony and murder aforesaid in manner and form as in and by the said indictment above specified is against them alleged. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid by the said jurors in form aforesaid found the court shall be of opinion that the killing of the said Richard Parker in manner aforesaid done and committed be felony and manslaughter, then the said jurors on their said oath say that the said Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens are each guilty of the felonious killing and slaying of the said Richard Parker. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid by the said jurors in form aforesaid found the court shall be of opinion that the aforesaid killing of the said Richard Parker be neither felony and murder nor felony and manslaughter, then the said jurors on their oath say that the said Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens are not guilty of the premises in the indictment specified and charged upon them."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9, 1884. The following judgment of the court was delivered by F LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The two prisoners, Thomas Dudley and Edwin Stephens, were indicted for the murder of Richard Parker on the high seas on July 25 in the present year. They were tried before HUDDLESTON, B., at Exeter on Nov. 6, and, under the direction of my learned brother, the jury returned a special verdict, the legal effect of which has been argued before us, and on which we are now to pronounce judgment. From the facts, stated with the cold precision of a special verdict, it appears sufficiently that the prisoners were subject to terrible temptation and to sufferings which might break down the bodily power of the strongest man, and try the conscience of the best. Other details yet more harrowing, facts still more loathsome and appalling, were presented to the jury, and are to be found recorded in my learned brother's notes. But nevertheless this is clear, that the prisoners put to death a weak and unoffending boy upon the chance of preserving their own lives by feeding upon his flesh and blood after he was killed, and with a certainty of depriving him of any possible chance of survival. The verdict finds in terms that: "if the men had not fed upon the body of the boy, they would probably not have survived . . ." and that "the boy, being in a much weaker condition, was likely to have died before them." They might possibly have been picked up next day by a passing ship; they might possibly not have been picked up at all; in either case it is obvious that the killing of the boy would have been an unnecessary and profitless act. It is found by the verdict that the boy was incapable of resistance, and, in fact, made none; and it is not even suggested that his death was due to any violence on his part attempted against, or even so much as feared by, them who killed him. Under these circumstances the jury say they are ignorant whether those who killed him were guilty of murder, and have referred it to this court to say what is the legal consequences which follow from the facts which they have found.

question in the case—whether killing, under the circumstances set forth in the verdict, be or be not murder. The contention that it could be anything else was to the minds of us all both new and strange, and we stopped the Attorney-General in his negative argument that we might hear what could be said in support of a proposition which appeared to us to be at once dangerous, immoral, and opposed to all legal principle and analogy. All, no doubt, that can be said has been urged before us, and we are now to consider and determine what it amounts to.

First, it is said that it follows, from various definitions of murder in books of authority—which definitions imply, if they do not state, the doctrine—that, in order to save your own life you may lawfully take away the life of another, when that other is neither attempting nor threatening yours, nor is guilty of any illegal act whatever towards you or anyone else. But, if these definitions be looked at, they will not be found to sustain the contention. The earliest in point of date is the passage cited to us from BRACTON, who wrote in the reign of Henry III. It was at one time the fashion to discredit BRACTON because he was supposed to mingle too much of the canonist and civilian with the common lawyer. There is now no such feeling; but the passage upon homicide, on which reliance is placed, is a remarkable example of the kind of writing which may explain it. Sin and crime are spoken of as apparently equally illegal; and the crime of murder, it is expressly declared, may be committed lingua vel facto; so that a man, like Hero, “done to death by slanderous tongues,” would, it seems, in the opinion of BRACTON, be a person in respect of whom might be grounded a legal indictment for murder. But in the very passage as to necessity, on which reliance has been placed, it is clear that BRACTON is speaking of necessity in the ordinary sense, the repelling by violence—violence justified so far as it was necessary for the object—any illegal violence used towards oneself. If, says BRACTON (Lib. iii, Art. De Corona, cap. 4, fol. 120), the necessity be “evitabilis et evadere posset absque occisione, tunc erit reus homicidii”—words which show clearly that he is thinking of physical danger, from which escape may be possible, and that “inevitabilis necessitas,” of which he speaks as justifying homicide, is a necessity of the same nature.

It is, if possible, yet clearer that the doctrine contended for receives no support from the great authority of LORD HALE. It is plain that in his view the necessity which justifies homicide is that only which has always been, and is now, considered a justification. He says (1 Hale, P.C. 491):

“In all these cases of homicide by necessity, as in pursuit of a felon, in killing him that assaults to rob, or comes to burn or break a house, or the like, which are in themselves no felony.”

Again, he says that the necessity which justifies homicide is of two kinds:

“(1) That necessity which is of a private nature; (2) That necessity which relates to the public justice and safety. The former is that necessity which obligeth a man to his own defence and safeguard; and this takes in these inquiries: 1. What may be done for the safeguard of a man’s own life;”

and then follow three other heads not necessary to pursue. LORD HALE proceeds (1 Hale, P.C. 478):

“1. As touching the first of these, viz., homicide in defence of a man’s own life, which is usually styled se defendendo.”

It is not possible to use words more clear to show that LORD HALE regarded the private necessity which justified, and alone justified, the taking the life of another for the safeguard of one’s own to be what is commonly called self-defence. But if this could be even doubtful upon LORD HALE’s words. LORD HALE himself has made it clear, for, in the chapter in which he deals with the exemption created by compulsion or necessity, he thus expresses himself (1 Hale, P.C. 51):

“If a man be desperately assaulted, and in peril of death, and cannot otherwise escape, unless to satisfy his assailant’s fury he will kill an innocent person then

A present, the fear and actual force will not acquit him of the crime and punishment of murder if he commit the fact, for he ought rather to die himself than to kill an innocent; but if he cannot otherwise save his own life, the law permits him in his own defence to kill the assailant, for, by the violence of the assault and the offence committed upon him by the assailant himself, the law of nature and necessity hath made him his own protector cum debito modamine inculpatæ tutelæ."

But, further still, LORD HALE, in the following chapter (1 Hale, P.C. 54), deals with the position asserted by the casuists, and sanctioned, as he says, by GROTIUS and PUFFENDORF, that in a case of extreme necessity, either of hunger or clothing,

C "theft is no theft, or at least not punishable as theft, and some even of our own lawyers have asserted the same; but I take it that here in England that rule, at least by the laws of England, is false, and, therefore, if a person, being under necessity for want of victuals or clothes, shall upon that account clandestinely and animo furandi steal another man's goods, it is a felony and a crime by the laws of England punishable with death."

D If, therefore, LORD HALE is clear, as he is, that extreme necessity of hunger does not justify larceny, what would he have said to the doctrine that it justified murder?

E It is satisfactory to find that another great authority, second probably only to LORD HALE, speaks with the same unhesitating clearness on this matter. SIR MICHAEL FOSTER, in chapter 3 of his DISCOURSE ON HOMICIDE, deals with the subject of "Homicide founded in Necessity," and the whole chapter implies, and is insensible unless it does imply, that, in the view of SIR MICHAEL FOSTER, necessity and self-defence (which in s. 1 he defines as "opposing force to force even to the death") are convertible terms. There is no hint, no trace of the doctrine now contended for; the whole reasoning of the chapter is entirely inconsistent with it. In EAST (1 East, P.C. 271), the whole chapter on "Homicide by Necessity" is taken up with an elaborate discussion of the limits within which necessity in SIR MICHAEL FOSTER's sense (given above) of self-defence is a justification of or excuse for homicide. There is a short section at the end (p. 294), very generally and very doubtfully expressed, in which the only instance discussed is the well-known one of two shipwrecked men on a plank able to sustain only one of them, and the conclusion is left by SIR EDWARD EAST entirely undetermined.

G What is true of SIR EDWARD EAST is true also of MR. SERJEANT HAWKINS. The whole of his chapter on "Justifiable Homicide" assumes that the only justifiable homicide of a private nature is in defence against force of a man's person, house, or goods. In s. 26 we find again the case of the two shipwrecked men and the single plank, with this significant expression from a careful writer: "It is said to be justifiable." So, too, DALTON, c. 150, clearly considers necessity and self-defence, in SIR MICHAEL FOSTER's sense of that expression, to be convertible terms, though he prints without comment LORD BACON's instance of the two men on one plank as a quotation from LORD BACON, adding nothing whatever to it of his own; and there is a remarkable passage at p. 339, in which he says that even in the case of a murderous assault upon a man, yet before he may take the life of the man who assaults him, even in self-defence, "cuncta prius tentanda." The passage in STAUNFORD, on which almost the whole of the dicta we have been considering are built, when it comes to be examined, does not warrant the conclusion which has been derived from it. The necessity to justify homicide must be, he says, inevitable, and the example which he gives to illustrate his meaning is the very same which has just been cited from DALTON, showing that the necessity he was speaking of was a physical necessity, and the self-defence a defence against physical violence. RUSSELL merely repeats the language of the old textbooks, and adds no new authority nor any fresh considerations.

I Is there, then, any authority for the proposition which has been presented to us? Decided cases there are none. The case of the seven English sailors referred to by the commentator on GROTIUS and by PUFFENDORF has been discovered by a gentleman of the Bar (Sir Sherston Baker), who communicated with HUDDLESTON, B., to convey the authority, if it conveys so much, of a single judge of the island of St. Kitts, when that island was possessed partly by France and partly by this country, somewhere about the year 1641. It is mentioned in a medical treatise published at Amsterdam (OBSERVATIONUM MEDICARUM by NICOLAUS TULPIUS), and is altogether, as authority in an English court, as unsatisfactory as possible. The American case (Commonwealth v. Holmes (1)) cited by STEPHEN, J., in his DIGEST from WHARTON ON HOMICIDE, p. 237, in which it was decided, correctly indeed, that sailors had no right to throw passengers overboard to save themselves, but, on the somewhat strange ground that the proper mode of determining who was to be sacrificed was to vote upon the subject by ballot, can hardly, as STEPHEN, J., says, be an authority satisfactory to a court in this country. The observations of LORD MANSFIELD in R. v. Stratton (2), striking and excellent as they are, were delivered in a political trial, where the question was, whether a political necessity had arisen for deposing a governor of Madras. But they have little application to the case before us, which must be decided on very different considerations.

The one real authority of former time is LORD BACON, who in his Commentary on the maxim, "Necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata," lays down the law as follows:

"Necessity carrieth a privilege in itself. Necessity is of three sorts: Necessity of conservation of life, necessity of obedience, and necessity of the act of God or of a stranger. First, of conservation of life. If a man steals viands to satisfy his present hunger, this is no felony nor larceny. So if divers be in danger of drowning by the casting away of some boat or barge, and one of them get to some plank, or on the boat's side, to keep himself above water, and another to save his life thrusts him from it, whereby he is drowned, this is neither se defendendo nor by misadventure, but justifiable."

On this it is to be observed that LORD BACON's proposition that stealing to satisfy hunger is no larceny is hardly supported by STAUNDFORDE, whom he cites for it, and is expressly contradicted by LORD HALE in the passage already cited. As for the proposition regarding the plank or boat it is said to be derived from the canonists; at any rate, he cites no authority for it, and it must stand upon his own. LORD BACON was great even as a lawyer, but it is permissible to much smaller men, relying upon principle and on the authority of others the equals and even the superiors of LORD BACON as lawyers, to question the soundness of his dictum. There are many conceivable states of things in which it might possibly be true, but, if LORD BACON meant to lay down the broad proposition that a man may save his life by killing, if necessary, an innocent and unoffending neighbour, it certainly is not law at the present day.

There remains the authority of STEPHEN, J., who both in his DIGEST (art. 32) and in his HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW (vol. 2, p. 108) uses language perhaps wide enough to cover this case. The language is somewhat vague in both places, but it does not in either place cover this case of necessity, and we have the best authority for saying that it was not meant to cover it. If it had been necessary we must with true deference have differed from him; but it is satisfactory to know that we have, probably at least, arrived at no conclusion in which, if he had been a member of the court, he would have been unable to agree. Neither are we in conflict with any opinion expressed upon this subject by the learned persons who formed the commission for preparing the CRIMINAL CODE. They say on this subject:

"We are not prepared to suggest that necessity should in every case be a justification; we are equally unprepared to suggest that necessity should in no case be a defence. We judge it better to leave such questions to be dealt with when, if ever, they arise in practice by applying the principles of law to the circumstances of the particular case."

A It would have been satisfactory to us if these eminent persons could have told us whether the received definitions of legal necessity were, in their judgment, correct and exhaustive, and, if not, in what way they should be amended; but as it is we have, as they say, "to apply the principles of law to the circumstances of this particular case."

B Except for the purpose of testing how far the conservation of a man's own life is in all cases and under all circumstances an absolute, unqualified, and paramount duty, we exclude from our consideration all the incidents of war. We are dealing with a case of private homicide, not one imposed upon men in the service of their Sovereign or in the defence of their country. It is admitted that the deliberate killing of this unoffending and unresisting boy was clearly murder, unless the killing can be justified by some well-recognised excuse admitted by the law. It is further admitted that there was in this case no such excuse, unless the killing was justified by what has been called necessity. But the temptation to the act which existed here was not what the law has ever called necessity. Nor is this to be regretted. Though law and morality are not the same, and though many things may be immoral which are not necessarily illegal, yet the absolute divorce of law from morality would be of fatal consequence, and such divorce would follow if the temptation to murder in this case were to be held by law an absolute defence of it. It is not so.

C To preserve one's life is generally speaking, a duty, but it may be the plainest and the highest duty to sacrifice it. War is full of instances in which it is a man's duty not to live, but to die. The duty, in case of shipwreck, of a captain to his crew, of the crew to the passengers, of soldiers to women and children, as in the noble case of The Birkenhead—these duties impose on men the moral necessity, not of the preservation, but of the sacrifice, of their lives for others, from which in no country—least of all it is to be hoped in England—will men ever shrink, as indeed they have not shrunk. It is not correct, therefore, to say that there is any absolute and unqualified necessity to preserve one's life. "Necesse est ut eam, non ut vivam," is a saying of a Roman officer quoted by LORD BACON himself with high eulogy in the very chapter on Necessity, to which so much reference has been made.

F It would be a very easy and cheap display of common-place learning to quote from Greek and Latin authors—from HORACE, from JUVENAL, from CICERO, from EURIPIDES—passage after passage in which the duty of dying for others has been laid down in glowing and emphatic language as resulting from the principles of heathen ethics. It is enough in a Christian country to remind ourselves of the Great Example which we profess to follow.

G It is not needful to point out the awful danger of admitting the principle which has been contended for. Who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? Is it to be strength, or intellect, or what? It is plain that the principle leaves to him who is to profit by it to determine the necessity which will justify him in deliberately taking another's life to save his own. In this case the weakest, the youngest, the most unresisting was chosen. Was it more necessary to kill him than one of the grown men? The answer must be, No.

"So spake the Fiend; and with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds."

I It is not suggested that in this particular case the "deeds" were "devilish"; but it is quite plain that such a principle, once admitted, might be made the legal cloke for unbridled passion and atrocious crime. There is no path safe for judges to tread but to ascertain the law to the best of their ability, and to declare it according to their judgment, and if in any case the law appears to be too severe on individuals, to leave it to the Sovereign to exercise that prerogative of mercy which the Constitution has entrusted to the hands fittest to dispense it. It must not be supposed that, in refusing to admit temptation to be an excuse for crime, it is forgotten how terrible the temptation was, how awful the suffering, how hard in such trials to keep the judgment straight and the conduct pure. We are often compelled to set up standards we cannot reach ourselves, and to lay down rules which we could not ourselves satisfy. But a man has no right to declare temptation to be an excuse, though he might himself have yielded to it, nor allow compassion for the criminal to change or weaken in any manner the legal definition of the crime. It is, therefore, our duty to declare that the prisoners' act in this case was wilful murder; that the facts as stated in the verdict are no legal justification of the homicide; and to say that, in our unanimous opinion, they are, upon this special verdict, guilty of murder.

R. v. COX AND ANOTHER

[COURT FOR CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED (Grove, J., Pollock, B., Huddleston, B., Hawkins, Lopes, Stephen, Watkin Williams†, Mathew, Day and A. L. Smith, JJ.), June 21, December 20, 1884]

Solicitor—Privilege—Communication between solicitor and client—Advice sought to assist client to commit crime.

If a client applies to a solicitor for advice which is intended to facilitate, or to guide the client in the commission of, a crime or fraud, the solicitor being ignorant of the purpose for which his advice is wanted, the communication between the two is not privileged. The rule relating to privilege does not apply to all which passes between a client and his solicitor. For the rule to apply there must be both professional confidence and professional employment. If the client has a criminal object in view in his communications with his solicitor, one of these elements must necessarily be absent. The client must either conspire with his solicitor or deceive him. If his criminal object is avowed, the client does not consult his solicitor professionally because it cannot be the solicitor's business to further any criminal object. If the client does not avow his object he reposes no confidence and the solicitor's advice is obtained by fraud. Accordingly, no privilege can be claimed for a communication between a solicitor and his client which is a step preparatory to the commission of a criminal offence, and evidence of the communication is admissible on the prosecution of the client for the offence. In each case the court must determine, on the facts actually given in evidence or proposed to be given in evidence, whether it seems probable that the accused person may have consulted his legal adviser, not after the commission of the crime for the legitimate purpose of being defended, but before the commission of the crime for the purpose of being guided or helped in committing it.

Case Stated for the opinion of the court with regard to a prosecution for conspiracy tried before the recorder of London at the Central Criminal Court.

F. Clarke, Q.C., Gore and Gill for the defendants.

Woollett and Willoughby for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20, 1884. STEPHEN, J., read the following judgment of the court.—This case was tried before the recorder of London at the February sessions of the Central Criminal Court. The defendants were convicted subject to a Case reserved for our opinion. The matter was argued first before five judges on April 5, and afterwards, on account of its great importance, before ten judges on June 21. We said on that occasion that we were unanimously of opinion that the conviction must be confirmed, but we deferred the statement of our reasons in order that they might be given with due fullness and deliberation. A

The facts were as follows. The two defendants, Richard Cobden Cox and Richard Johnson Railton, were indicted for a conspiracy with intent to defraud Henry Munster. The indictment was set out as part of the case. It contained six counts, and was objected to on grounds which we do not think it necessary to state, as we are all of opinion that some at least of the counts were good, and as the objections made to others were not insisted on in argument. The serious question was as to the admissibility of the evidence of a solicitor, which was given under the following circumstances. On April 9, 1881, the two defendants entered into a partnership in the business of newspaper proprietors with respect to a newspaper called "The Brightonian." In February, 1882, Mr. Munster brought an action against Railton for a libel which appeared in that paper. On June 24, 1882, the action ended in a verdict for the plaintiff for 40s. and costs as between solicitor and client. The costs were taxed on Aug. 18, and on Aug. 20 execution was issued against Railton for the amount. The sheriff was met by a bill of sale from Railton to Cox, dated Aug. 12, 1882, and withdrew. An interpleader action to test the validity of the bill of sale was tried on Jan. 15, 1883. At that trial the deed of partnership of April 9, 1881, was produced, bearing upon it an endorsement purporting to be a memorandum of dissolution of partnership, dated Jan. 3, 1882. B C D

The case for the prosecution was that the bill of sale was a fraudulent bill of sale of the partnership assets, entered into between Railton and Cox while they were partners, for the purpose of depriving Mr. Munster of the fruits of his judgment, and that the memorandum of dissolution of partnership was endorsed on the deed, not on Jan. 3, 1882, when it bore date, but subsequently to Mr. Munster's judgment. In order to prove this case, Mr. Goodman, a solicitor, was called, who said (his evidence having been objected to, and the objection having been overruled): E

"On June 28, or thereabouts, Railton and Cox came to me. Railton said: 'I suppose you have heard the result of the Munster case?' I said: 'Yes.' He said: 'Can anything be done to prevent the property being seized under an execution?' I said: 'Only a sale to a bona fide purchaser.' He said: 'Could the property be sold and I remain in possession as manager?' I said: 'No; you must go out of possession.' He said: 'That won't do. Can I give a bill of sale to Mr. Cox?' I said: 'You cannot, because of the partnership.' Railton said: 'Does anyone know of the partnership besides you and ourselves?' I said: 'No; not that I am aware of, only my clerks.' Cox said: 'Then you do not think a bill of sale will do?' I said: 'Certainly not.' They then asked my fee and paid it, and left the office. Nothing was said about a dissolution at that interview. The interview was with me as a solicitor, and I was paid my fee. It was expressly arranged that the partnership should be kept secret. Nothing either way was said about a dissolution." F G

The question for our decision was whether this evidence was rightly admitted. We must take it after the verdict of the jury, that, so far as the defendants Railton and Cox were concerned, their communication with Mr. Goodman was a step preparatory to the commission of a criminal offence, namely, a conspiracy to defraud. The conduct of Mr. Goodman, the solicitor, appears to have been unobjectionable. He was consulted in the ordinary course of business, and gave a proper opinion in good faith. The question, therefore, is whether, if a client applies to a legal adviser for advice intended to facilitate, or to guide the client in the commission of, a crime or fraud, the legal adviser being ignorant of the purpose for which his advice is wanted, the communication between the two is privileged. H
We expressed our opinion at the end of the argument that no such privilege existed. If it did, the result would be that a man intending to commit treason or murder might safely take legal advice for the purpose of enabling himself to do so with impunity, and that the solicitor to whom the application was made would not be at liberty to give information against his client for the purpose of frustrating his

A criminal purpose. Consequences so monstrous reduce to an absurdity any principle or rule in which they are involved.

Upon the fullest examination of the authorities, we believe that they are not warranted by any principle or rule of the law of England; but it must be admitted that the law upon the subject has never been so distinctly and fully stated as to show clearly that these consequences do not follow from principles which do form
 B part of the law, and which it is of the highest importance to maintain in their integrity. We must also observe that decisions have been given—one by the Court of Common Pleas, and several by single judges sitting in the Crown Courts, or at nisi prius—which have afforded some countenance to the supposition that the law of England is committed to doctrines from which these consequences might be deduced. We propose, accordingly, first to state what, upon a full consideration
 C of the cases, appears to us to be the principle upon which the present case must be decided, and then to examine the principal cases in which it has been applied, with the view of showing that our decision is not inconsistent with the great majority of them, though it undoubtedly does differ from others.

The case which has always been regarded as the great leading authority on the question of privilege of legal advisers is Greenough v. Gaskell (1) decided by LORD
 D BROUGHAM in 1833. The question in that case was whether a solicitor, Gaskell, charged with a fraud upon Greenough arising out of the affairs of Darwell, could be compelled to disclose to Greenough communications between Gaskell and Darwell, giving an account of the transactions which led to the commission of the alleged fraud, and it was held that he could not. In this case the rule as to professional communications was laid down in the following words (1 My. & K. at E p. 102):

“If touching matters which come within the ordinary scope of professional employment [legal advisers] receive a communication in their professional capacity, either from a client, or on his account, and for his benefit in the transaction of his business, or, which amounts to the same thing, if they
 F commit to paper, in the course of their employment on his behalf, matters which they know only through their professional relation to the client, they are not only justified in withholding such matters, but bound to withhold them, and will not be compelled to disclose the information or produce the papers in any court of law or equity, either as party or as witness.”

LORD BROUGHAM adds (ibid. at p. 103):

G “The foundation of this rule is not difficult to discover. . . . It is out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and the administration of justice, which cannot go on without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations which form the subject of all judicial proceedings.”

H LORD BROUGHAM then proceeds to comment on the terms of the rule so stated, and to show that many apparent exceptions to it are not really within its terms.

This rule has been accepted and acted upon ever since, and we fully recognise its authority; but we think that the present case does not fall either under the reason on which it rests, or within the terms in which it is expressed. The reason on which the rule is said to rest cannot include the case of communications criminal in themselves, or intended to further any criminal purpose, for the protection
 I of such communications cannot possibly be otherwise than injurious to the interests of justice, and to the administration of justice. Nor do such communications fall within the terms of the rule. A communication in furtherance of a criminal purpose does not “come into the ordinary scope of professional employment.” A single illustration will make this plain. It is part of the business of a solicitor to draw wills. Suppose a person, impersonating someone else, instructs a solicitor to draw a will in the name of the supposed testator, executes it in the name of the supposed testator, gives the solicitor his fee, and takes away the will. It would be monstrous to say that the solicitor was employed in the "ordinary scope of professional employment." He in such a case is made an unconscious instrument in the commission of crime. It is probable that if cases of this kind had been present to LORD BROUGHAM's mind when he delivered judgment in Greenough v. Gaskell (1), he would have inserted words by way of exception or explanation to express his meaning more explicitly; but the caution with which he worded the principle appears to us to have the same effect as the insertion of such a qualification would have had. It seems to us, at all events, that the case which we are now considering falls neither within the letter nor the spirit of the description given by LORD BROUGHAM of the privilege of legal advisers.

We will now state in the order of time the cases which confirm us in this view. In Follett v. Jefferyes (2) a defendant was interrogated as to letters written by her to her solicitor, said to have been intended to carry out a fraud. It was held that what she proposed to do was not fraudulent, but at the end of his judgment LORD CRANWORTH, V.-C., said (1 Sim.N.S. at p. 17):

"It is not accurate to speak of cases of fraud contrived by the client and solicitor in concert together as cases of exception to the general rule. They are cases not coming within the rule itself, for the rule does not apply to all which passes between a client and his solicitor, but only to what passes between them in professional confidence, and no court can permit it to be said that the contriving of a fraud can form part of the professional occupation of an attorney or solicitor."

It is true that this is only a dictum, but it shows decisively how LORD CRANWORTH understood the rule on this subject, and this suggests another observation. In order that the rule may apply there must be both professional confidence and professional employment, but if the client has a criminal object in view in his communications with his solicitor, one of these elements must necessarily be absent. The client must either conspire with his solicitor or deceive him. If his criminal object is avowed, the client does not consult his adviser professionally, because it cannot be the solicitor's business to further any criminal object. If the client does not avow his object he reposes no confidence, for the state of facts, which is the foundation of the supposed confidence, does not exist. The solicitor's advice is obtained by a fraud.

To return to our former illustration. If A., proposing to forge a will, says to B., a solicitor: "Forge for me a will in the name of C.," he asks B. to commit a crime, which is not B.'s professional business. If he says: "I am C., and I want you to make my will for me," he reposes no confidence in B., but, on the contrary, commits a gross fraud upon him. In 1851 Russell v. Jackson (3) was decided before TURNER, V.-C. It was alleged that a testator had left certain property upon a secret trust, and his solicitor was examined as to the existence of the trust and its nature. A motion was made to suppress his deposition, on the ground that he had been compelled to violate professional confidence in making it. TURNER, V.-C., held that the privilege did not exist at all as between different people claiming under the client, as the client's intentions were more likely to be carried out if his communication with his solicitor were known than if they were concealed. It was further objected that the disclosure of the communication "might lead to the disclosure of an illegal purpose." SIR GEORGE TURNER observed on this that he thought that the communication could not be protected on that account. He added (9 Hare, at pp. 392, 393):

"On the contrary, I am very much disposed to think that the existence of the illegal purpose would prevent any privilege attaching to the communication. When a solicitor is a party to a fraud, no privilege attaches to the communications with him upon the subject, because the contriving of a fraud is no part of his duty as solicitor, and I think it can as little be said that it is part of the duty of a solicitor to advise his client as to the means of evading the law."

A In 1857 Gartside v. Outram (4) was decided by SIR W. PAGE WOOD, V.-C. It was a case in which a firm of woolbrokers sought to restrain a man who had been their sale clerk from disclosing their transactions. He replied that the transactions were fraudulent. The Vice-Chancellor delivered a judgment, which we think is well summed-up by the headnote (26 L.J.Ch. 113): "Confidential communications involving fraud are not privileged from disclosure." The following observations in B the judgment appear to us very weighty, and bear directly on the present question (ibid. at p. 114):

"The true doctrine is that there is no confidence as to the disclosure of iniquity. You cannot make me the confidant of a crime or a fraud, and be entitled to close up my lips upon any secret which you have the audacity to disclose to me relating to any fraudulent intention on your part. Such a confidence cannot exist."

C He afterwards refers, by way of illustration, to the question of professional confidence (ibid. at p. 115):

"As regards the question before courts of justice, when the question has been whether a witness ought to disclose that which has been communicated to him, D I think the authorities largely preponderate for allowing no such protection, even in one of the most confidential relations—that between attorney and client."

After referring to some cases which we shall examine more fully hereafter, he says that he adopts as his own language used in argument in Annesley v. Earl of Anglesea (5) by SERJEANT TISDALL (17 State Tr. at p. 1229):

E "I shall first beg leave to consider whether an attorney may be examined to any matter which came to his knowledge as an attorney. If he is employed as an attorney in any unlawful or wicked act, his duty to the public obliges him to disclose it. No private obligations can dispense with that universal one which lies on every member of the society to discover every design which may be formed contrary to the laws of the society to destroy the public welfare."

F The Vice-Chancellor quotes with approbation parts of the judgments of the judges in the same case, and to much the same effect.

The last of this series of cases to which we shall refer appears to us to be directly in point in the present case. It is part of R. v. Orton (6). Orton was indicted for perjury in denying that he was Orton, and affirming that he was Tichborne. G He gave Mr. Holmes, a solicitor, instructions to prepare a will disposing of the property to which he said he was entitled, and as part of the evidence against him consisted in the alleged resemblance of his handwriting to that of Orton and its alleged difference from that of Tichborne, the instructions for the will were tendered for the purpose of enforcing this argument. They were objected to on the ground of professional privilege, and the court dealt with the matter as follows. H COCKBURN, C.J., said:

I "We must assume prima facie for the purpose of the inquiry, but only for that purpose, that the purpose which the defendant had in seeking to obtain these estates, which he proposed here to dispose of by the will for which he gives instructions to Mr. Holmes, was a fraudulent purpose, that of obtaining estates to which he was not entitled. Then the principle on which we proceed is this: that where anything is done, any communication made from a client to an attorney, with reference to a fraudulent purpose, the privilege does not exist. The fraudulent character of the communication takes away the privilege. Now here, assuming hypothetically for the mere purpose of the argument, that which is the subject-matter of this inquiry, which the jury will eventually have to determine, that the defendant was engaged in a fraudulent scheme to acquire estates to which he was not entitled, and gives instructions for a will, by which will these estates which he thus fraudulently seeks to acquire are to be disposed of, and amongst other things these estates, or portions of them, are intended to be given to his attorney and other persons who are co-operating with him in this scheme. Now, inasmuch as this would be for the purpose of having the effect of stimulating the attorney to more activity and earnestness in assisting him to carry out this scheme, which we assume for the purpose is based on fraud and iniquity, then that is dehors the privilege. If he had told his attorney beforehand that he was seeking to acquire estates to which he was not entitled, and employed the attorney for the purpose, the attorney, however innocent—in the one case of course he would not be innocent; but, assuming the attorney knew nothing of the iniquity or wickedness of the purpose, but believed himself honestly employed—yet if the client had a dishonest purpose in view in the communication he makes to his attorney, with the view of making the attorney the innocent instrument of carrying out the fraud, it deprives the communication of the privilege. So I think here that if the communication has not for its immediate object the carrying out of a fraud, but still affects the accomplishment of it by inducing the attorney to take greater care and to use more diligence and be more careful than he otherwise would be in the furtherance of the thing, it still comes to the same thing. Of course in deciding such a question we must for the purpose assume that the purpose was a fraudulent one, because that is the way the case is presented to us. Of course we are not pronouncing any opinion as to the affirmative. We have still the inquiry involving that question, but whatever further inquiry there may be I think it is admissible."

MELLOR, J., agreed. LUSH, J., said :

"I am disposed myself to put it on this wider ground, and to hold that the law does not allow under the name of privilege any person to withhold evidence which is within his power which may be used in support of a criminal charge."

In Tichborne v. Lushington (7), out of which the prosecution of Orton for perjury arose, BOVILL, C.J., at the close of the case said :

"I believe the law is, and properly is, that if a party consults an attorney and obtains advice for what afterwards turns out to be the commission of a crime or fraud, that party so consulting the attorney has no privilege whatever to close the lips of the attorney for stating the truth. Indeed, if any such privilege should be contended for or existed, it would work most grievous hardship on an attorney who, after he had been consulted upon what subsequently appeared a most manifest crime and fraud, would have his lips closed, and might place himself in the very serious position of being suspected to be a party to the fraud, and without his having an opportunity of exculpating himself. . . . There is no privilege in the case which I have suggested of a party consulting another, a professional man, as to what may afterwards turn out to be a crime or fraud, and the best mode of accomplishing it."

Upon these grounds we think that the question asked of Mr. Goodman in the present case was properly put and answered. We now proceed to consider the cases, some of which have produced a different impression.

We may first shortly notice three Chancery cases to which we have been referred. In one of these (Kelly v. Jackson (8)) it was decided that a solicitor who had suggested a fraud to his client could not claim privilege on the ground that his knowledge of the matter was derived from his client. In the other two (Mornington v. Mornington (9), and Charlton v. Coombes (10)) it was held that where client and solicitor were co-conspirators in a fraud, the solicitor must be charged with the fraud if discovery was required of him, but nothing was said as to the case of fraudulent or criminal communications by a guilty client to an innocent solicitor. We may, accordingly, pass by these cases without further notice.

The cases decided at nisi prius, or in the courts of common law, are as follows, taking them in order of time. The first is Annesley v. Earl of Anglesea (5), tried in Dublin in 1743. We have already mentioned the principal point in this case

A as having been quoted with approval by LORD HATHERLEY in Gartside v. Outram (4). The question was whether Lord Anglesey had caused Annesley, the true heir to the property, to be kidnapped and carried off to America in order that Lord Anglesey might enjoy the family estates. The evidence offered was that Lord Anglesey had employed an attorney to prosecute Annesley for murder in respect of the death of a person whom Annesley had accidentally killed, saying he would "give £10,000 if he could get him hanged." On this evidence the remarks already quoted, and others to the same effect, were made on a trial at Bar.

B The next case was R. v. Dixon (11) decided in 1765. In this case one Peach had produced forged vouchers before a master in Chancery, and Dixon, his attorney, was subpoenaed to produce them to the grand jury before which Peach was indicted. He refused, and an attachment was moved for against him, but the court refused to grant it. It does not appear how the papers came into Dixon's hands. There is certainly nothing to show that Peach gave them to him for any unlawful purpose. C He may have deposited them with him after the crime, and for the purposes of his defence.

The next case is Cromack v. Heathcote (12) decided in 1820. In this case the question was whether a deed was fraudulent, and

D "to prove the fraud the defendant proposed, among other evidence, to call Smith, an attorney, to whom the father [the assignor] had applied to draw the assignment, and who had refused to draw it, knowing that an execution had been issued against the father."

E The full Court of Common Pleas, DALLAS, C.J., and BURROUGH and RICHARDSON, JJ., held that this evidence was rightly rejected at the trial. This case closely resembles the one now before us. Indeed, the only distinction is that the objection taken to the evidence was that the privilege of solicitors extended only to communications made in the progress of a cause. The court, accordingly, do not seem to have had before them the considerations to which we have addressed ourselves. If the case cannot be supported on this ground we differ from it, as it seems to us to be F opposed not only to all principle but to the series of authorities which we have already referred to. It is right to say that Cromack v. Heathcote (12) is approved of in Greenough v. Gaskell (1) and in other cases, but it is cited only as a general statement of the doctrine of privilege, and the particular point now under consideration is not discussed or mentioned. The point for which it is cited is that it decides that privilege is not confined to communications made in the course of a G suit.

The next case is R. v. Smith (13). In this case HOLROYD, J., refused to compel an attorney to produce a forged promissory note which the prisoner had given to him in order to sue upon it. It had been produced before the magistrates and returned to the attorney at his request, as he said he had a lien on it. We do not agree with this decision. It was said not to be law by PATTISON, J., in R. v. Avery (14), though some years afterwards he said that "the observations he was reported to have made about it seem too strong:" R. v. Tuffs (15), 1 Den. at p. 324. H The nisi prius case of Doe d. Shellard v. Harris (16), decided in 1833 by PARKE, J., was precisely similar to Cromack v. Heathcote (12), and was decided expressly on the authority of that case. Knight v. Turquand (17) was also mentioned to us. It is enough to say of it that it was not a case of fraud or crime.

I The next case is R. v. Hayward (18). In that case POLLOCK, C.B., admitted a forged will which the prisoners by a trick had got into the possession of the attorney who produced it, hoping that he might act on it, as he did. The judges held that this will was rightly admitted, there having been no professional confidence, "even if that could have made any difference." This case is an authority in favour of the view taken by us. There can in reason be no distinction between getting a will into a solicitor's possession by fraudulently putting it among other documents and getting his advice by telling a lie as to the object for which it is asked.

The last case to be mentioned is R. v. Tuffs (15). In this case the indictment was for forging a will. It had been put into the hands of an attorney in order to be put in force, and the question was whether he could produce it in evidence. The evidence was admitted, and on the prisoner's conviction a case was reserved for the fifteen judges. They recommended a pardon on another point, and gave no opinion as to the admissibility of the evidence. From the observations made during the argument by different learned judges, as reported in the LAW JOURNAL, it would seem that there was some difference of opinion on the subject: see 18 L.J.M.C. at pp. 37, 38. A B

From this examination of the authorities it will be seen that we differ from one decision of the full Court of Common Pleas, and from two decisions at nisi prius, but we do so on the strength of other decisions which appear to us not only to be of greater authority, but also to be more in accordance with legal principles as well as with justice and expediency. C

We have one other matter to notice. We were greatly pressed with the argument that, speaking practically, the admission of any such exception to the privilege of legal advisers as that it is not to extend to communications made in furtherance of any criminal or fraudulent purpose would greatly diminish the value of that privilege. The privilege must, it was argued, be violated in order to ascertain whether it exists. The secret must be told in order to see whether it ought to be kept. We were earnestly pressed to lay down some rule as to the manner in which this consequence should be avoided. The only thing which we feel authorised to say upon this matter is that in each particular case the court must determine, upon the facts actually given in evidence or proposed to be given in evidence whether it seems probable that the accused person may have consulted his legal adviser, not after the commission of the crime for the legitimate purpose of being defended, but before the commission of the crime for the purpose of being guided or helped in committing it. We are far from saying that the question whether the advice was taken before or after the offence will always be decisive as to the admissibility of such evidence. Courts must in every instance judge for themselves on the special facts of each case, just as they must judge whether a witness deserves to be examined on the supposition that he is hostile, or whether a dying declaration was made in the immediate prospect of death. D E F

In this particular case the fact that there had been a partnership (which was proved on the trial of the interpleader issue), the assertion that it had been dissolved, the fact that directly after the verdict a solicitor was consulted, and the fact that the execution creditor was met by a bill of sale which purported to have been made by the defendant to the man who had been and was said to have ceased to be his partner, made it probable that the visit to the solicitor was really intended for the purpose for which, after he had given his evidence, it turned out to have been intended. If the interview had been for an innocent purpose, the evidence given would have done the defendants good instead of harm. Of course, the power in question ought to be used with the greatest care not to hamper prisoners in making their defence, and not to enable unscrupulous persons to acquire knowledge to which they have no right, and every precaution should be taken against compelling unnecessary disclosures. Conviction affirmed.

REDGRAVE v. HURD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Baggallay and Lush, L.JJ.), November 25, 26, 28, 1881]

[Reported 20 Ch.D. 1; 51 L.J.Ch. 113; 45 L.T. 485; 30 W.R. 251]

Misrepresentation—Innocent misrepresentation—Contract—Rescission—Defence—Opportunity given to plaintiff to discover falsity of representation—Failure of plaintiff to act thereon—Need for plaintiff to prove knowledge of falsity by defendant.

It is no defence to an action for rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation that the party who seeks to set aside the contract was afforded opportunities of investigation and so of ascertaining the inaccuracy of the representation, but made the investigation so inefficiently or negligently that he did not discover the misrepresentation. He is not thereby deprived of the relief of rescission. In ordinary circumstances the false representation, once made, relieves him from making an investigation, even if the opportunity is afforded.

Per SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.: In order for a contract which has been obtained by misrepresentation to be set aside it is not necessary that it should be proved that the person who made the misrepresentation knew that it was false when he made it.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of Fry, J., in an action for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant of a leasehold house, in which action the defendant counterclaimed for rescission of the contract on the ground of misrepresentation. A

The plaintiff, who was a solicitor in practice near Birmingham, inserted the following advertisement in the LAW TIMES of Jan. 10, 1880 :

"Law Partnership.—An elderly solicitor of moderate practice, with extensive connections in a very populous town in a midland county, contemplates shortly retiring, and, having no successor, would first take as partner an efficient lawyer and advocate about forty, who would not object to purchase advertiser's suburban residence suitable for a family, value £1,600, three-fourths of which might remain on security; no premium for business and introduction. A large field is here open for an efficient man and great advantages for free education of sons.—Address R. J. (No. 1919), 10 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C." B C

The defendant, a solicitor, was attracted by the advertisement and entered into correspondence with the plaintiff with reference to the subject of the advertisement, and it was arranged that the plaintiff should receive the defendant as his partner, and transfer to him a moiety of his practice. Certain representations as to the practice were made by the plaintiff, and certain investigations and inquiries were made by the defendant. On Mar. 2, 1880, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a written agreement, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to purchase, for the sum of £1,600, a plot of land on the east side of the Pershore Road, in the parish of Edgbaston, in the county of Warwick, held of Lord Calthorpe for ninety-nine years from Mar. 25, 1876, at a rent of £12 5s. 4d., and also the dwelling-house and other buildings erected on the land. A deposit of £100 was to be paid down, further sums of £100 and £200 were to be paid on May 1 and June 24, 1880. On completion the defendant was to give the plaintiff a second mortgage for £400, and in lieu of paying the balance of the purchase money (£800), was to covenant to pay off an existing mortgage of £800. No mention of the partnership or business was made in the agreement. The deposit was paid, the title was accepted, and the drafts of the assignment and mortgage were approved. On April 17, 1880, the defendant was let into possession of the property comprised in the agreement, and went to reside there with his family. The defendant afterwards ceased to reside on the property, and refused to complete the purchase thereof. The plaintiff commenced the present action for specific performance of the agreement to purchase the land and buildings. The statement of defence alleged that the arrangement was for the transfer of a moiety of the practice and the leasehold house, the defendant agreeing to pay as consideration for the transfer both of the share in the law practice and of the leasehold house the sum of £1,600. The other material parts of the defence were as follows : D E F G

"The defendant earnestly requested the plaintiff that the facts [last stated], as they constituted the real contract between the parties, should be set out in the written agreement of Mar. 2, 1880, in order that it might clearly appear therein that the payment by defendant of the sum of £1,600 was a consideration for the transfer of the leasehold house and of the share in the law practice, but the plaintiff refused, and the defendant for reasons appearing in the next paragraph now alleges that in such refusal the plaintiff was actuated by a fraudulent intention. Shortly after the partnership between the plaintiff and defendant had been entered into in pursuance of the agreement thereto, the defendant discovered that the said law practice was utterly worthless, and that the representations made in regard thereto by the plaintiff were false, and the defendant says that the plaintiff made such false representations for the purpose of inducing him (the defendant) to enter into the contract for the purchase of the said partnership. By way of counterclaim the defendant relies upon the facts stated in his defence as though they were again repeated, and H I

- A claims: (i) To have the contract of Mar. 2, 1880, rescinded, and the sum of £100 [the deposit] returned to him by the plaintiff. (ii) The sum of £100 damages for the loss occasioned and trouble incurred by the defendant in removing his household. . . . (iii) The sum of £200 damages for the surrender by the defendant of his [former practice], such surrender having been occasioned by the misrepresentation of the plaintiff."
- B The action was tried by FRY, J., on Mar. 15, 1881, when the learned judge gave judgment for the defendant and dismissed the counterclaim. The defendant appealed.
- Cookson, Q.C.*, and Ruegg for the defendant.
Rigby, Q.C., and Yate Lee for the plaintiff.
- C SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of FRY, J., granting specific performance to the plaintiff of a contract to buy a house, and dismissing with costs a counterclaim by the defendant asking for rescission of the contract and for damages on the ground of deceit practised by the plaintiff in respect to this agreement. We have not considered the question of deceit raised by the counterclaim, because the defendant has not pleaded knowledge on the part of the plaintiff that the allegations were untrue, nor has he pleaded, in fact, the allegations themselves in sufficient detail to found an action for deceit. Therefore, that part of the case must necessarily fail, so far as damages are concerned. It only remains to consider the portion of the case of the plaintiff asking for specific performance, and the portion of the case for the defendant asking to have the contract rescinded. Before going into the details of the case, I wish to say
- E something about my view of the law of it, because in the books, and even in some observations of noble Lords in the House of Lords, there are remarks which I think, according to the course of modern decision, are not well founded, and do not accurately state the law.
- As regards the rescission of a contract, there was, no doubt, a difference between the rules of courts of equity and the rules of courts of common law—a difference
- F which, of course, has now disappeared by operation of the Judicature Act, which makes the rule in equity prevail. According to the decisions of courts of equity, it was not necessary, in order to set aside the contract, to prove that the person who obtained the contract and sought to keep it, if he obtained it by material false representation, knew at the time the representation was made that such representation was false. It was put in two ways, either of which was to be
- G sufficient to allow a court of equity to rescind. It was said: "A man is not to be allowed to get a benefit from a false statement which he now admits to be false. He is not to be allowed to say for the purpose of civil jurisdiction that he did not know it to be false; he ought to have found that out before he made the representation." That is one way of putting it: and the other way of putting it was this: "Even assuming that you want moral fraud (this was the doctrine of common
- H law) in order to set aside a contract, you have it where a man, having obtained a beneficial contract by a statement which he now knows to be false insists upon keeping that contract." That, of course, is a moral delinquency; no man ought to seek to take advantage of his own falsity. It does not matter which way it is put, but that was the rule in equity. As regards the rule of common law, there is no doubt it was not quite so wide. There were cases in which, even at common
- I law, you could rescind a contract, although you could not show that the man knew the statement or the representation to be false. The cases are variously stated, but I think, according to the later decisions, the statement must have been made recklessly and without care whether it was true or false, and not, of course, at the time with the belief that it was actually true. I think the doctrine in equity was settled beyond controversy, and if it were necessary to refer to the authorities I should content myself with referring to the judgment of LORD CAIRNS, L.J., in Re Reese River Silver Mining Co., Smith's Case (1), in which he states the doctrine of equity in the way in which I have stated it.

There is another proposition of law, of very great importance, which I think it is necessary for me to state, because, with great deference to the very learned judge in matters of specific performance from whom this appeal comes, I think it is not quite accurately stated in his judgment. If a man is induced to enter into a contract by false representation, it is not a sufficient answer to him to say: "If you had used due diligence you would have found out that the report was untrue. You had the means afforded you of discovering its falsity, which you did not choose to avail yourself of." I take it, it is a settled doctrine of equity, not only as regards specific performance, but also as regards rescission, that that is not an answer, of course subject to the exception of the statute of limitations, when it is made a statutory answer on the ground of delay. That, of course, is a different thing altogether. There, delay deprived a man of his right, and the only question to be considered was from what time the delay should count. It was decided, and is now so made law by statute, that the time counted from the date when, by due diligence, that fraud might have been discovered [see now Limitation Act, 1939, s. 26 (c)]. Nothing can be plainer, I take it, on the authorities in equity, than that false representation is not got rid of by the defendant—that is, the person resisting performance of the contract, or asking for rescission on the ground of deceit—being guilty of negligence.

One of the most familiar instances in modern times, and one which occurs in case after case, both reported and unreported, is this. Men issue a prospectus containing false statements—false statements of the contracts made before the formation of the company, and on similar matters—and then say the contracts themselves may be inspected at the office of the solicitors. It has always been held that those who accept those false statements as true are not deprived of their remedy merely because they neglected to go and look at the contracts themselves, though they were told the contracts were in writing and might be inspected if they asked to see them. Another instance with which we are familiar is a false statement as to the contents of a lease; such a case as a man saying that there was no covenant or provision in the lease to prevent the carrying on, in the house to be sold, the trade which the purchaser was known by the vendor to be desirous of carrying on therein. Although the lease itself might be produced at the sale, or might have been open to the inspection of the purchaser long previously to the sale, it was held that the vendor could not be allowed to say: "You were not entitled to give credit to my statement, either by word of mouth or in writing." It is not sufficient, therefore, to say that a man has had the opportunity of investigating the real state of the case, but has not availed himself of that opportunity.

It has been apparently supposed by the learned judge in the court below that the decision of the House of Lords in Attwood v. Small (2) is an authority which conflicts with that proposition. He says the defendant

"inquired into it to a certain extent, and if he did it carelessly and inefficiently, that is his own fault. As in the case of Attwood v. Small (2) those directors and agents of the company who made ineffectual inquiry into the business which was to be sold to the company were nevertheless held, by their investigation, to have bound the company, so here, I think, the defendant, who made a cursory investigation into the position of things on Feb. 17 must be taken to have accepted the statements which appeared in those papers."

Those are the remarks which are, I think, inaccurate in law; and what is more, I think they are not borne out by the case to which the learned judge referred. Where you have five Lords giving independent reasons for their opinions it is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain with accuracy the ground upon which the House of Lords decided. If the five Lords give five different sets of reasons, as happens sometimes, you have the decision, and you must find out for yourself which of the opinions is to be relied upon as giving the proper reasons; but I think in Attwood v. Small (2), and in all these cases, you must only look at the

A judgments of the Lords who decided the case. In Attwood v. Small (2) there were three to five. You must look only at the opinions of the Lords who decided the case, because their opinions alone are of importance and, therefore, whatever reasons are to be found in their opinions must be either wholly or to some extent the opinion which guided the House of Lords in coming to their conclusion. Therefore, in considering the opinions in that case, I have confined myself for
B this purpose to the opinions of the three Lords who decided the case in favour of the appellants.

The first opinion is that of the EARL OF DEVON, whose opinion, no doubt, is entitled to great respect. But he was called in to make up the fifth Lord, so to say. He had been a master in Chancery at some period of his life, and, although his opinion is entitled to great respect, yet, standing alone, it would not command
C that respect and that consideration which would be given to that of the Lord Chancellor, LORD COTTENHAM, who was also present. Therefore, in weighing his judgment, it is out of no disrespect to the EARL OF DEVON, or to his memory, that I say that I do not attach so much importance to it as I do to that of LORD COTTENHAM. The ground of the EARL OF DEVON's opinion is reported in these words (6 Cl. & Fin. at p. 344):

D "The question is not as to waiver or acquiescence in fraud, but whether the parties have used that ordinary degree of vigilance and circumspection in order to protect themselves, which the law has a right to expect from those who apply for its aid."

In that sentence I think he is not quite correct as regards the law, but the next
E ground, the ground of his decision, is this:

"The whole course of the proceeding from its commencement to its close tends to show that the purchasers did not rely upon any statements made to them, but resolved to examine and judge for themselves."

That is a good ground if it were borne out. It does not agree with the reasons
F that are given by the other judges, but there it is, and if you rely upon that, the ground was that the representations did not induce the purchasers to enter into the contract.

I now turn to the conclusion in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor. LORD COTTENHAM says (6 Cl. & Fin. at p. 393):

G "We are now trying two propositions by this evidence: first, whether fraud was practised; and secondly, whether that which is alleged as fraud, or rather the facts from which fraud is inferred, were not known to the plaintiff, or to those by whose conduct and by whose knowledge they must be affected from the very commencement of this transaction. I have satisfied myself that both these propositions are in favour of the defendant."

H That is, he found, not only no fraud, but that all the material facts were known before the contract was entered into. He continues:

I "I do not find the fact of fraud made out, although undoubtedly it may be supposed that the bargain was a very good one for Mr. Attwood. That is not the matter in question, but that the fraud alleged, which alone can be resorted to for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's case, is not made out in fact, and that the circumstances from which that fraud is endeavoured to be inferred by the plaintiffs are in my opinion proved to have been known to them from the beginning."

Those are the two grounds of his decision, and neither of them is anything like the proposition to be found in the judgment of FRY, J., that there may be cursory or ineffectual attempts by his agents to discover the fraud, and that he is liable for the ineffectual attempts so made. There is a sentence in the EARL OF DEVON's opinion to that effect, but not in LORD COTTENHAM's.

The only other opinion which was in favour of the appeal was that of LORD A BROUGHAM, who says (6 Cl. & Fin. at p. 497):

"When we apply to this case the principles which I stated at the outset, we find the facts are wanting; we find that there is no misrepresentation which gave rise to the contract."

That is, he concurs with LORD COTTENHAM that there is no fraud. That is the B first ground. He continues:

"We find that the purchaser did not rely upon the representation, but said,
'We will inquire ourselves.'"

That is the second ground, and that is the same as the EARL OF DEVON's ground, and also would be a good answer. LORD COTTENHAM did not take that view. LORD C BROUGHAM continues:

"From June 6, 1825, downwards they constantly proceeded upon the plan of satisfying themselves—first, by sending their agents, then by going down themselves, then by inquiring themselves, then even afterwards by sending other agents to inquire, and those agents reporting that the representation was true; and that, those parties, finding by their own inquiries [not, as D FRY, J., puts it, 'the imperfect inquiries of agents'] that the agents had reported accurately, and that the representation was corroborated by the result of the inquiry; and that, even when their own interest, when everything in the commercial world, was down—when shares were falling—when money was not to be had—when they were asking time for a prolongation of the time of payment to Mr. Attwood, and when it was their interest to discover a flaw in the contract—they then inquire again, and send a new agent to inquire (Mr. E Foster, an engineer); and they state to him their own opinion to be in favour of Mr. Attwood's representations; and Mr. Foster, in answer, as late as April 26—less than a month before the bill was put upon the file—reports in favour of Mr. Attwood's representations. Such being the facts—even if no observation arose as to the delay as to the adoption and affirmance of the con- F tract, purging it of all objections which might be made, and supposing that they had come in time, instead of delaying so many months—then I ask myself this question: In these circumstances, have these parties a right to be released from their contract by the interposition of a court of equity, according to those principles which I have stated? When I ask myself that question, upon which alone my judgment must turn, I am bound to say No."

So that his two grounds are—no fraud (no misrepresentation), and that they G did not rely on the statements made. He agreed in one reason with LORD COTTEN-HAM, and in the other with LORD DEVON. But, take it which way you will, the three grounds alleged by the three noble Lords—one having one, and each of the other two—amounted to, no fraud, actual knowledge of the facts before the contract, no reliance upon the misrepresentation. In no way, as it appears to me, does H the real decision, or do the real grounds of decision, in Attwood v. Small (2) support the proposition that it is a good defence to an action for rescission of a contract on the ground of fraud that the man who comes to set aside the contract inquired to a certain extent, but did it carelessly and inefficiently, and, therefore, did not observe the fraud, and is thereby prevented from upsetting the contract. I thought it right to make these observations because it is very important that the I law on this subject should be clearly understood, and that no cursory remarks in an opinion by a Lord in the House of Lords should be allowed to unsettle that law if it were possible.

Now as to the facts of this case. I must say I agree with FRY, J., as to all of them except one, and my failure to agree with him in that one is the cause of my concurring in reversing his decision. What he finds in effect is that the defendant was induced to enter into the contract by a misrepresentation—a material misrepresentation—made to him by the plaintiff, and, that being so, the learned

A judge comes to the conclusion that either the defendant did not finally rely upon that representation, or that, if he did rely upon it, he had made an inquiry which, although ineffectual, and made as he says carelessly and inefficiently, bound him in a court of equity and prevented him from saying that he relied on the representation. I have already dealt with that as a matter of law, and I will deal with it presently as a matter of fact. [His LORDSHIP dealt with the facts in some detail, and continued:] The learned judge says that, although the defendant did not trouble to look into the books, he had the opportunity of doing so, and that, if he had intended to rely on a parol representation of business beyond that which appeared in the papers, having the materials before him, he would have made some inquiry. There were no books before the defendant which he could look into to ascertain the correctness of the statements made by the plaintiff, and the whole foundation of the judgment on this part of the case, even if it had been well founded in law, fails in fact, because the defendant was not guilty of negligence in doing that which it was impossible to do, books not being in existence which would show the amount of business done. The learned judge came to the conclusion either that the defendant did not rely on the statement, or that, if he did rely upon it, he had shown such negligence as to deprive him of his title to relief from this court.

As I have already said, the latter part is, in my opinion, not founded in law, and the former part is not founded in fact, and I think also is not founded in law, and for this reason. When a person makes a material representation to another to induce him to enter into a contract, and the other enters into that contract, it is not sufficient to say that the defendant does not prove he entered into the contract relying upon it, because, if it is a material representation calculated to induce him to enter into the contract, that is a conclusion at which you arrive by inference. You must show that he abandoned it—either that he had knowledge of the facts contrary to the representation, or that he did somehow or other state explicitly that he did not rely on the representations. If you tell a man: “You may enter into partnership with me; my business is bringing in between £300 and £400 a year,” the man who makes that representation must know it is a material inducement for the other to enter into the partnership, and you cannot investigate whether it was more or less probable that that inducement would operate on the mind of the defendant. When you have neither evidence that he knew facts to show that the statement was untrue, or that he said or did anything to show that he did not actually rely upon the statement, the inference remains that he did so rely, and it must be treated as an inducement to enter into the contract, and being a material statement, it is a sufficient ground for rescinding the contract.

For all these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge must be reversed, and the appeal allowed. The defendant has failed in proving his accusations of fraud, and must, therefore, pay the costs of the issues so raised, and on which he has failed. But the general costs of the action should be given to him, and the costs of the appeal. As regards the form of the judgment, as the defendant succeeds on the counterclaim, I think it would be safer to make an order both in the action and the counterclaim, rescinding the contract and ordering the deposit to be returned. It is not a case in which damages should be given.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Upon the hearing of this action FRY, J., held, as an inference of fact, from the evidence before him, that a misrepresentation was made by the plaintiff to the defendant as to the value of his professional business. From a finding so arrived at the Court of Appeal will not ordinarily differ. The learned judge of the court below has had the opportunity of hearing and seeing the witnesses, and of observing the manner in which their evidence was given. It must be a very strong case indeed in which the Court of Appeal, upon a question of fact, entirely depending upon oral testimony, will dissent from the finding of the court below. FRY, J., also found that the defendant should be considered in a court of equity as having been influenced by the misrepresentation to enter into the contract. If the view taken by Fry, J., was right on that second point, the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed, but I am unable to concur in his conclusion. A

The facts from which that conclusion was drawn were partly suggested by oral testimony and partly by written documents. As regards the oral testimony, if I have followed it aright from the judgment of Fry, J., it amounted to this, that opportunities were afforded to the defendant to ascertain the inaccuracy of the representation made to him, if he had cause to do so, and, further, that to some extent at least he did avail himself of that opportunity. The mere fact that a party has the opportunity of investigating and ascertaining whether the misrepresentation is true or false is not sufficient to deprive the defendant of his right in an action for specific performance to rely upon the representation. The person who has made the misrepresentation cannot be heard to say to the party to whom he has made that representation: "You chose to believe me when you might have doubted me and gone further." The representation once made relieves the party from an investigation, even if the opportunity is afforded. I do not mean to say that there may not be certain circumstances of suspicion which might put a person upon inquiry and make it his duty to inquire, but under ordinary circumstances the mere fact that he does not avail himself of the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the representation made to him will not enable the opposing party to succeed on that ground. B C D

The case that was referred to by counsel for the defendant in his argument, of Rawlins v. Wickham (3), is a very strong illustration of the application of that principle, for in that case a person had been deceived and thereby led into a partnership and continued in partnership for four years, and then for the first time discovered the fraud which had been practised upon him, and it was said that at any time, if he had doubted the accuracy of the representation made to him, he might have investigated matters for himself. But the inference that Fry, J., has also drawn, is that to some extent there was an investigation of a most cursory character, and it was that which would not at all have enabled him to have ascertained the truth or the falsity of the representations that had been made. It appears to me, therefore, that, so far as the conclusions arrived at by the learned judge upon consideration of the oral testimony on that second point are concerned, I am unable to agree with him. E F

As regards the written testimony it is all one way. Very different considerations apply to a case in which the testimony before the judge in the court below is written from that in which it is oral. Each of the three judges of the Court of Appeal has just as good an opportunity of judging of the value of written correspondence or written documents as the judge before whom the case is originally brought, and it is for them to consider whether, as far as the written testimony is concerned, they concur in the view taken by the court below. As I have said before, it appears to me that the written testimony is all one way. The invitation clearly was to persons who were professional men in the business of a solicitor, and the suggestion in the first instance was that there was a favourable opening for any such person. The very correspondence which passed between the defendant and the plaintiff informed the plaintiff that the defendant was a gentleman who was seeking to establish himself in the business of a solicitor in some place, to obtain a sufficient business to bring up his family, and particularly, among other things, with a view of introducing one of his own sons into the profession. The plaintiff must have known from the correspondence that the advantages suggested by him in connection with the business which he was himself about to surrender was an influential motive to the defendant in entering into the contract. It is quite true that the contract actually signed was limited to the purchase of the house; but it is impossible to say that the defendant was not solely influenced to enter into the contract, so far as regards the house, by the probability of establishing himself in a remunerative business. On these grounds also I think that the decision of the court below ought to be reversed. G H I

A LUSH, L.J.—I entirely agree with my learned brothers as to the propositions of law applicable to this case, which have been laid down by the Master of the Rolls, and, as they have been so clearly and pointedly expressed, I do not think it at all necessary to repeat them, because I have not myself the least qualification to suggest as to those propositions. In one part of the judgment of the learned judge in the court below he appears to hold that, where a false representation has been made and papers are handed to the party to whom it is made, from which, if he chose, he might detect the falsehood, and he does not do so, he is in the same position as if he had done so. I entirely differ from that view, and think what my learned brother said is the correct view of the law—that where a false representation has been made, it lies on the party who makes it to show that, although he made the false representation, the defendant—the other party—did not rely on it. The onus probandi is on him to show that the other party waived it, and relied on his own knowledge. Nothing of that kind appears here.

I regret to say that I cannot follow the learned judge in the inference he draws from the facts which were before him. It is clear that the business represented in the papers was a business not exceeding £200 a year in any one of the three years which those papers referred to; therefore, the learned judge finds, as a matter of fact, that the defendant, although the representation had been made that the business yielded £300 a year, was content to buy a business bringing in only £200 a year. He does not, therefore, though he lays down the proposition of law to which I have referred, decide the case on that proposition. He decided it on the question of fact, that, although the representation had been made, the defendant relied upon the future potential business which the plaintiff held out; that he ceased to rely on the representation; and was content to take the business as one which would suit him. I do not find, from the beginning to the end, any evidence whatever which justifies that conclusion. After looking at the papers produced to him, the defendant said substantially that in no single year had the business come up to £300, or about £300, not even the last year, as to which the representation was made. He wanted to know what would make up the difference, upon which the plaintiff pointed to a number of letters and papers and said: "It is contained in those letters; it is not entered in the books, but it is to be found there." The learned judge says it was the common ground of both parties that in answer to the inquiry from the defendant the plaintiff said; "There was other business which was not entered in those papers," and the plaintiff himself says, in his answers to interrogatories, speaking of that interview: "I produced the said papers to the defendant and stated to him, as the fact was, that the items of business mentioned therein did not represent all the business done for the years 1877, 1878, and 1879, but that I had done other items of business which I had not entered in the said bills." So far, in my judgment, from that sanctioning the idea that the defendant had agreed to accept what appeared in those papers as representing the amount of business done, it is an actual affirmance by the plaintiff of his own representation.

H I am sorry to say that I entirely differ from the conclusion which the learned judge has drawn from those pieces of evidence. On another point the learned judge held what I think was perfectly right, that the contract for the house and for the purchase of the business was one entire contract; the one being the inducement to the other, and the principal subject of that contract between the parties was the partnership, which was to end in the sale of the business. The purchase of the house was only an accessory. I entirely agree with the conclusions which have been arrived at, and that this contract should be rescinded.

Appeal allowed.

CAPITAL AND COUNTIES BANK, LTD. v. HENTY & SON

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Selborne, L.C., Lord Penzance, Lord Blackburn, Lord Watson and Lord Bramwell), November 11, 15, 22, 1881, June 6, 8, July 13, August 1, 1882]

[Reported 7 App. Cas. 741; 52 L.J.Q.B. 282; 47 L.T. 662;
47 J.P. 214; 31 W.R. 157]

Libel—Action—Trial—Question for judge—Whether words complained of capable of being defamatory—Question for jury—Whether words in fact defamatory. Libel—Defamatory words—Words capable of bearing innocent as well as defamatory meaning—Right of plaintiff to succeed with regard to defamatory meaning.

In an action for libel it is for the judge to say whether the words complained of are capable of bearing the defamatory meaning ascribed to them by the innuendo, and, if he takes the view that they are, it is a question for the jury whether the words have the meaning so ascribed to them. The test is whether in the circumstances in which the words were published, and where nothing is alleged to give them an extended sense, reasonable men to whom the words were published would be likely to understand them in a libellous sense. In deciding whether the words are capable of such a meaning the judge ought not to take into account any mere conjectures which a person reading the document might possibly form as to some out of various motives or reasons which might have actuated the writer unless there is something in the document itself, or in other facts properly in evidence, which to a reasonable mind would suggest those particular motives or reasons. Where there are a number of interpretations which can be put on the words complained of the plaintiff cannot succeed on the one interpretation which gives the words a defamatory meaning.

Libel—Defined.

Per LORD BLACKBURN: A libel for which an action will lie is defined to be a written statement published without lawful justification or excuse, calculated to convey to those to whom it is published an imputation on the plaintiffs, injurious to them in their trade, or holding them up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ., THESIGER, L.J., dissenting), reported 5 C.P.D. 514, reversing a decision of the Common Pleas Division (GROVE and DENMAN, JJ.) in favour of the plaintiffs, a firm of bankers, in an action in respect of an alleged libel, which, it was asserted, imputed to them that their cheques were not safe to receive. A

The appellants, the Capital and Counties Bank, were bankers carrying on business in Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and elsewhere, and the respondents, Henty & Son, were brewers at Chichester. Until 1878 the defendants had allowed their travellers to receive cheques on the different branches of the plaintiffs' bank, which they were in the habit of cashing at the plaintiffs' branch at Chichester. In that year, however, a new manager of the Chichester branch of the plaintiffs' bank declined to cash cheques not drawn on that branch. Messrs. Henty & Son wrote to the manager to complain, stating that if he did not cash the cheques of the bank as before they would send out an order to tenants of their licensed houses not to take such cheques. In answer to that the manager wrote that he should certainly decline to cash any cheques not drawn on his branch of the bank, unless for parties introduced and properly authorised by the firm. He added: "I am quite indifferent to your sending out orders to your tenants not to take our cheques." B
Thereupon Messrs. Henty & Son sent out a circular letter in these terms: C

"Messrs. Henty & Son hereby give notice that they will not receive in payment cheques drawn on any of the branches of the Capital and Counties Bank." D

The bank complained that that letter was published "falsely and maliciously," and meant

"that the plaintiffs were not to be relied upon to meet the cheques drawn on them, and that their position was such that they were not to be trusted to cash the cheques of their customers." E

The defendants denied, stating the circumstances under which the circular came to be written. The case was tried before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., who, upon evidence of some persons who had seen the circular and said they thought from it that the bank was "shaky," left questions to the jury on which they could not agree, so that they were discharged without giving a verdict. The defendants moved the Common Pleas Division for judgment, on the ground that there was no evidence to support a verdict for the plaintiffs, but GROVE and DENMAN, JJ., refused to accede to the application, and held that the case must go to trial again. The Court of Appeal reversed that decision and from their decision the present appeal was brought. F G

Aug. 1, 1882. The following opinions were read. H

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—I have read with interest the able and instructive opinions of those of your Lordships who have endeavoured to ascertain with exactness the respective provinces of judge and jury in a question of libel or no libel, when the alleged libellous meaning is not to be collected, according to ordinary rules of construction, from the mere words which the defendants have used. Into I think inquiry I will not follow them further than to say that the authorities which I think most material are Woolnoth v. Meadows (1); Wood v. Brown (2); Wright v. Clements (3); Goldstein v. Foss (4); Hearne v. Stowell (5); and Capel v. Jones (6). I should willingly have deferred to the experience, learning, and ability of those who have thought the evidence in the present case proper to be left to a jury if the disagreement from them of others not less entitled to respect had not compelled me to trust more than I could have wished to my own judgment. The Court of Appeal has thought that there was no evidence to go to a jury, and I must be I

A satisfied that their judgment was wrong before I can say that it ought to be reversed.

I do not understand any of the learned judges in the courts below to have been of opinion (nor do I think it is the opinion of any of your Lordships) that the question of libel or no libel must always, and necessarily, be left to a jury as to words not in themselves (i.e., in their proper and natural meaning, according to the ordinary rules for the interpretation of written instruments) libellous, without some evidence, either of a libellous purpose on the part of the writer, or of some other extrinsic facts calculated to lead reasonable men to understand them in a libellous sense. I should myself be very sorry if such were the law. In Sturt v. Blagg (7), WILDE, C.J., said (10 Q.B. at p. 908):

C "It is the duty of the judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by an innuendo; but when the judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has the meaning so ascribed to it."

If the judge, taking into account the manner and the occasion of the publication, and all other facts which are properly in evidence, is not satisfied that the words are capable of the meaning ascribed to them, then it is not his duty to leave the question raised by the innuendo to the jury. In deciding the question whether the words are capable of that meaning, he ought not, in my opinion, to take into account any mere conjectures which a person reading the document might possibly form, as to some out of various motives or reasons which might have actuated the writer, unless there is something in the document itself, or in other facts properly in evidence, which to a reasonable mind would suggest those particular motives or reasons.

E The alleged libel, in the present case, is a printed circular sent through the post by the defendants to certain of their tenants and customers, giving them notice that the defendants would "not receive in payment cheques drawn on any of the branches of the Capital and Counties Bank." The meaning ascribed to this document by the innuendo is

F "that the plaintiffs were not to be relied upon to meet the cheques drawn on them, and that their position was such that they were not to be trusted to cash the cheques of their customers."

C The question is whether there was evidence to be left to the jury in support of that innuendo. From the words, standing by themselves, it appears to me to be impossible to collect such a meaning on any known principle of construction. By construction merely the only conclusion to be arrived at is that they mean exactly what they say, viz., that the defendants had come to a resolution not to receive, in payment of any moneys due, or to become due to them, from the persons to whom that circular was addressed, cheques drawn on any of the branches of the plaintiffs' bank. For such a resolution they might have had various motives and reasons, good, bad, or indifferent. To mention some, which (whether morally right or not) would be remote from any question of libel, the defendants might (as the fact really was) have taken offence at some conduct on the part of the plaintiffs' agents; or they might have found that mode of payment, from some cause or other, inconvenient; or they might have had greater facilities for cashing cheques drawn upon the branches of some other bank; or they might wish, as far as their influence went, to favour some competitors of the plaintiffs in the business of banking. They were under no obligation to give, and they did not give any reason; and it would, in my opinion, be arbitrary, and not reasonable, to imply, from the mere words of the circular, an imputation upon the plaintiffs' credit or solvency.

The test, according to the authorities, is whether, under the circumstances in which the writing was published, reasonable men, to whom the publication was made, would be likely to understand it in a libellous sense. Sometimes, perhaps generally, that test may be satisfied from the mere words of the documents; in this case I think it is plain that the mere words of the document are not enough for that purpose. What, then, were the circumstances under which and who were the persons to whom this circular was published? In order to consider how they, as reasonable men, ought to be supposed to have understood it, all that had passed between Messrs. Henty and the plaintiffs' manager at Chichester (however material to the actual intention of the defendants) must be disregarded. What had so passed was unknown to the persons to whom the publication was made. Most of those persons were tenants of, and the rest were purchasers of beer from, the defendants. They resided at various places in Sussex and the neighbouring counties. The practice of the defendants had been to collect, from time to time, by their travellers, moneys due to them from those persons, and to accept payment from them (wholly or in part) by cheques on local banks. Among the cheques which, in the ordinary course of business, were likely (or not unlikely) to come into the hands of these persons, and which, therefore, they might be likely (or not unlikely) from time to time to offer in payment to the defendants, some were or might be drawn upon different branches of the plaintiffs' bank, as others were or might be drawn upon different branches of the London and County Bank, both of which had branches at Chichester and at several other places in the neighbouring district of Sussex and Hants. When such persons received an intimation that the defendants would not accept payment from them in cheques drawn upon branches of a particular bank, I cannot see why, as reasonable men, they should infer from it more than was said. It related to the mode of conducting, for the future, a regular course of business between themselves and the writers, as to which it was proper and reasonable (if the creditor had formed such a resolution) that the debtor should be informed of it. It is not, as I understand, disputed that the defendants were entitled to decide for themselves what cheques they would accept or decline to accept in payment from their debtors, or that such a communication from them to their tenants and customers, if made bona fide, was by law privileged.

This being so, I cannot perceive how persons standing in that relation to the defendants (whether one individual only, or few persons, or many) could reasonably draw a libellous inference from the mere fact of their receiving such a communication, unless the words of the circular, taken in their natural sense, conveyed the supposed imputation upon the plaintiffs. The publication was to those persons, and to those only, to whom, if the defendants meant merely what they said, it would naturally be addressed. No evidence was given from which, as it seems to me, a jury could have been justified in concluding that those to whom this circular was sent were intended to disseminate it among others, with whom the defendants had no business relations. On the contrary, there was uncontradicted evidence that the defendants did not send it to all their customers, but only to those whom they thought likely, at some time or other, to offer payment by cheques on the plaintiffs' bank. It seems that some of those who received the circular did, in fact, show it to some strangers; but I cannot think that any such communication by them to strangers, unauthorised by the defendants themselves, could properly be evidence in support of the innuendo. If it had been publicly placarded by the defendants on the walls of Chichester or other towns, or had been advertised by them in newspapers, or sent by them through the post to persons with whom they had no business relations, this might have been evidence of a malicious intention, beyond what was expressed by the mere words of the document; but nothing of that kind was done.

It was said that the defendants, by some other mode of wording the circular, might have prevented mischief. But, if it was actually so worded and so published, as in itself to furnish no reasonable ground for any libellous interpretation, I cannot perceive that they were under any necessity of saying more, to repel an inference which what they had said did not justify. It was suggested that they might have made some distinction between the plaintiffs' branch at Chichester and their other branches. But the offence which they had taken at the conduct of the plaintiffs' manager at Chichester (whether reasonable or not) would have

A made any such exception of the Chichester branch inconsistent with the determination which they had actually formed to have no dealings which they could avoid with that gentleman. I may add that the circular in its actual terms does not seem to extend to the central or head office of the plaintiffs' bank in London. If an exception in favour of the Chichester branch would have prevented any inference adverse to the plaintiffs' credit, why should such an inference be drawn when
 B branches only were mentioned? There was no evidence that any single person to whom the circular was sent by the defendants acted upon it in a manner injurious to the plaintiffs. Mr. Smith, a customer of the plaintiffs, was one of those persons; he came to the manager of the plaintiffs' Landport branch, and produced to him the circular, asking what was the meaning of it, but he did not withdraw or reduce his account with the bank. There was no evidence of any extrinsic fact affecting
 C the reputation or credit of the plaintiffs' bank, at the time which could be connected with the circular so as to give it a meaning to those who read it which it might not otherwise have had.

I cannot but think that, under the old system of pleading, a statement of some extrinsic facts of this nature on the record would have been necessary to support the innuendo, having regard to the absence of any sufficient ground for it in the
 D words of the document; and this for reasons not technical: Goldstein v. Foss (4); Hearne v. Stowell (5); and Capel v. Jones (6). And, although no such matter of inducement need now be stated on the record, it seems to me that, without some evidence of facts which, when connected with the words of the document, would justify the meaning imputed to it, such a case ought not to go to a jury. I did not collect from the argument that the loss which the plaintiffs had suffered in the E preceding month, from a defalcation by one of their agents, was sufficient to have in any way affected their reputation or credit, or was relied on by them for that purpose. Their real reliance was upon what afterwards happened—namely, the extraordinary run upon the branches of their bank, which took place during the first and second weeks after the circular was issued. Before the second week the West of England Bank had failed, and its failure had been preceded by certain
 F sinister reports, which found their way into some London newspapers. Some evidence was undoubtedly given which tended to connect rumours, supposed to be founded on the defendants' circular, with the run which took place during the first (at all events) of those two weeks. But such rumours, or any consequences which they may have had, could not properly have been left to a jury as evidence tending to give a libellous meaning to the circular if the publication itself (for which alone
 G the plaintiffs were responsible) was not otherwise proved to be a libel. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., as I understand him, thought this part of the evidence proper to go to the jury, not for the purpose of proving the innuendo, but only to prove special damage if the circular were found to be a libel. I cannot, however, help thinking that, if the run upon those branches of the plaintiffs' bank, had not happened when it did, there would have been a much more general agreement among the judges
 H before whom this case has come; and, indeed, it is tolerably certain that, in that case, the action would never have been brought.

Apart, therefore, from the facts which bear directly upon the question of the defendants' purpose and intention, but were unknown to the persons who received the circular, I find no evidence that this was a libel proper to be left to a jury. As to those facts (which were not in controversy), it appears to me that evidence of
 I pride, anger, ill-temper, or unreasonableness is an entirely different thing from evidence of an intention (not otherwise proved) to cast imputations upon the credit or solvency of the plaintiffs' bank. I think there was more than enough evidence of pride, anger, ill-temper, and unreasonableness. In the excellent summing-up of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., there is but one thing said, as to the effect of the evidence, with which I cannot agree, and that is his intimation to the jury that, although nothing which had previously passed might have justified the conclusion that the defendants had a malicious intention, some evidence of such an intention might be derived from their reply to the last letter of Messrs. Stuckey & Co. [the appellants'] solicitors] threatening an action. It seems to me to be impossible justly to draw an inference of that kind from such a reply to such a letter, unless there were other circumstances sufficient to justify it. I should not have thought that any reasonable man who knew all that had passed between the defendants and Mr. Hooper [the appellants' manager at Chichester] could have put upon the circular the construction that an imputation on the plaintiffs credit or solvency was really thereby intended; and, if not, I am unable to understand how the same facts can be evidence in support of the innuendo. The defendants were angry, not indeed without reason, but beyond the bounds of reason; and they determined, as far as possible, to have no dealings with those who had offended them. They stated, openly and frankly, to the plaintiffs' manager what (unless conciliated) they would do, in terms not favourably distinguishable, to my mind, from those of the circular which they afterwards sent out. The answer which they received was not conciliatory, and in it the manager said that he was "quite indifferent as to their sending out orders to their tenants not to cash the bank's cheques." I do not regard this as in the nature of a permission (if the manager could have given it) to the defendants to publish a libel concerning the plaintiffs; but it does seem to me to be strong evidence that the plaintiffs' manager (whom I suppose to have been a reasonable man, and as well capable of comprehending the defendants' meaning at that time as he was afterwards) did not understand the act threatened by the defendants, or the communication proposed to be made by them to their tenants, as implying any imputation upon the credit or solvency of the bank.

If it had been the necessary or legitimate consequence of the action which the defendants took that their circular should be understood, or likely to be understood, by reasonable persons receiving it, in a libellous sense, they must be taken (for all purposes of legal responsibility) as having intended that consequence. But I have already said that I think this was not either the natural sense of, or a reasonable inference from, the words which they used or the act which they did; and the whole evidence appears to me against the supposition that they themselves intended it to convey that meaning. The result is that I think there was no evidence on which a jury could have been justified in finding that the defendants published a libel concerning the plaintiffs. The document not being a libel on the face of it is not shown to be so by any extrinsic evidence proper, in my judgment, to be considered by a jury for that purpose. Before it can be deprived of the privilege which it would undoubtedly possess if bona fide sent to the persons to whom it was addressed for the purpose appearing on the face of it, one of two things is necessary—either that the defendants should be shown to have sent it for some ulterior purpose not covered by that privilege (of which I see no evidence), or it must be shown improperly to bear the libellous meaning imputed to it. These are my reasons for being unable to differ from those of your lordships who are of opinion that the judgment under appeal is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs; and I shall move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD PENZANCE stated the facts, and continued: The contention of the defendants is that their circular was no more than an honest, innocent and justifiable announcement on their part to their customers that in future they must not expect that they would receive in payment any cheques on the plaintiffs' bank; that they had a right to refuse such cheques if they liked, and had also a right to announce their determination to do so to their customers, so as to prevent their being taken by surprise and put to inconvenience by this departure from their previous practice. If this is the fair conclusion to be drawn from the facts there can be little doubt, I think, but that they are not liable in this action; for, passing by for the moment all questions whether the circular ought to be considered libellous as conveying an imputation on the plaintiffs' credit injurious to them in their trade, the occasion of this circular being published would, upon the above supposition be so clearly a privileged occasion that nothing but proof of express malice would

A sustain the action, and express malice is upon the same supposition obviously excluded.

But the plaintiffs put a very different construction on the facts. In their view the occasion of the circular was not an honest or innocent one, but was invented and contrived out of anger, or petulance and ill-temper, at the manager of the bank presuming to throw any impediment in the way of the defendants' convenience.

B They, therefore, maintain that the circular was not privileged, but malicious, for that it was not a statement

"fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned."

C I use the definition of a privileged communication given by PARKE, B., in Toogood v. Spyring (8) (1 Cr.M. & R. at p. 193), which has been cited with approval in several subsequent cases. In a word, the plaintiffs contend that the circumstances of the case were quite sufficient to warrant a conclusion in the minds of the jury that all need for the circular was a mere pretence; that it was not dictated by a real or honest desire to save the defendants' customers inconvenience; but that it was solely conceived and designed in a spirit of petulance, if not actual ill-will, against the plaintiffs, and to let them feel the weight of a threat to which Mr. Hooper, their manager, announced himself to be "indifferent."

E If this is the fair result of the facts, and there was, I think, abundant evidence to justify a jury in so finding if they chose to do so, I confess that I think it puts a different complexion on the whole matter. I cannot doubt that in this aspect of the facts there was no privileged occasion, and, even if there were, there would be, upon the above supposition, what the law calls actual malice. It seems to me, therefore, impossible for your Lordships to decide whether the plaintiffs had a good cause of action without the previous decision of a jury as to the true objects, intentions, and motives of the defendants in the course they pursued, and as to how far, even supposing their original motives and objects to have been innocent, they exceeded either in the language of the circular or in the number of persons to whom they distributed it, the line of conduct which would be justified by those motives, and objects. It is true that one of the defendants said they only sent the circular to persons from whom they thought they were likely to receive the cheques in question; but whether this was the case or not would also be matter, I think, for a jury to determine. Until those matters of fact, and the proper conclusions to be drawn from them are established, I confess that I am at a loss to see how the court below, or your Lordships, can determine the question whether the publication of the circular gave a good cause of action or not.

G The majority of the Court of Appeal appear to have thought, not that these matters of fact were for the court to determine, but that, however they were determined, and whatever conclusions might be drawn from them of actual malicious injury on the part of the defendants, the plaintiffs could have no cause of action; and they have, therefore, refused to send the matter to a jury, and have given judgment for the defendants. I will state as shortly as I can why I consider this to be wrong. For this purpose I must assume for the moment that a jury might have found that this circular was issued, if not with an actual desire to injure the plaintiffs, at least in petulance and anger, and with indifference whether it caused injury to them or not, and that the supposed convenience of the defendants' customers was a mere excuse and blind to justify them in taking a step which would show the plaintiffs that it was not well to defy their threats, and that it would be advisable in future to consult their convenience. I must also assume that the jury might find that the number of people to whom the circular was sent was far larger than any innocent dictates of convenience would warrant. Upon the assumption that either of these conclusions might be arrived at by a jury, it has to be determined whether this action of libel can be maintained.

But here the preliminary question has been raised. Is it for the court or for a jury, upon a given state of facts and circumstances, to say whether the publication complained of is libellous or not? To sustain the judgment now under appeal, which has withdrawn everything from the jury, it is necessary that your Lordships should come to the conclusion that, whatever view may be taken of the facts, it is for the court and not for the jury to determine whether the circular did or did not in its terms amount to an actionable libel. I do not know whether the respondents intended to go so far as to say that the court, without the intervention of a jury, can in all cases determine a publication affirmatively to be a libel; but I do understand them to assert that the court, whatever the jury might think, is at liberty to hold that the publication is not a libel. There is no doubt that in past days, when special pleading was still in full force, it was held to be necessary that the plaintiff should set forth on the face of the record the publication itself, together with such facts as, taken in connection with it, would enable the court to see that he had a cause of action. It is hardly necessary to cite authorities for this, but I may mention Clement v. Fisher (9), Wood v. Brown (2), Wright v. Clements (3). I do not conceive that the principal involved in these decisions went any further than that the court required it to be shown to them on the record, so that a court of error could deal with it if need be, what the publication was, in order that they might judge whether a jury could reasonably, without doing violence to the principles and limits of the law of libel, pronounce the publication to be libellous. In other words, the court required to be satisfied that the matter of the publication might, without doing violence to its language, have such a meaning attached to it, or such a construction put upon it, as to render it libellous, and, subject to this limitation, it devolved upon the jury to say whether it was libellous or not.

This is precisely the view taken of the law by the Court of Queen's Bench in Blagg v. Sturt (7), where PARKE, B., left to the jury the question whether "they believed the innuendo as to the meaning of the letter or not." It was contended that he ought not to have done so. LORD DENMAN, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said (10 Q.B. at p. 905):

"We are also of opinion that the libel is capable of the meaning imputed by the innuendo; and as the jury have found it to be true, and the judge is not dissatisfied with the verdict, the rule is not granted."

Similar language was used in the Exchequer Chamber in the same case on appeal (ibid. at p. 908):

"Undoubtedly it is the duty of the judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by an innuendo: but when the judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has the meaning so ascribed to it."

Although special pleading has passed away, I do not consider that the law has been thereby altered, and I look upon the case first quoted, therefore, not as declaring any change in the law on the subject, but as placing in its true light what the law always has been, namely that it is for the court to say whether the publication is fairly capable of a construction which would make it libellous, and for the jury to say whether in fact that construction ought, under the circumstances, to be attributed to it. To go further than this would be to say that the question of libel or no libel is at one and the same time a question for the jury and also for the court, which would surely be an anomaly in English law, and that the question ought to be left to the jury with the proviso that they can only determine it effectively in the negative, for if they determine it in the affirmative their opinion will go for nothing, inasmuch as the court will afterwards determine the same question for themselves without reference to their verdict.

The only other alternative would be that which the Court of Appeal have adopted in this case, namely, not sending the case to a jury at all. This is, in fact, saying that although the plaintiff alleges in his innuendo that the circular in question was

A calculated to give rise, and did give rise, in the minds of those to whom it was addressed, to the inference that the defendants impugned the credit of the plaintiffs' bank, the court will settle for itself, not whether any such inference could reasonably be drawn from it by a jury, but whether any such inference would be drawn from it by persons of the class to which it was addressed, for that is the question, and the opinion of a jury is not needed. I very much doubt whether there is any

B authority for thus dealing with the question of libel. When the cases which have a contrary aspect come to be examined it will be found that they in nowise favour the proposition that the question of libellous construction should be withdrawn from the jury, but establish only that the plaintiff must show on the record such a publication, and such extraneous facts, if any, connected therewith as to leave room for a jury properly to declare it libellous.

C I will shortly refer to two of these cases. In Goldstein v. Foss (4) the supposed libel was a publication emanating from a trade protection society, and it all turned upon the use of the words "the said society," which, taken in connection with the context, were thought to convey an ambiguous reference, and so the judgment was arrested, and the plaintiff lost the benefit of his verdict. Hearne v. Stowell (5) is of a similar nature. The libel complained of consisted of a charge which the plaintiff alleged had injured him in his character of Roman Catholic priest. The judgment was arrested, because there was no statement on the record informing the court of the conduct which a Roman Catholic priest ought to pursue in imposing penance. It rested wholly upon the proposition that those facts which in the opinion of the court were necessary to establish the libellous character of the publication were not stated on the record, although they might have been, and indeed to some extent were, given in evidence before the jury. I am confirmed in my opinion as to the true bearing of this decision by the comments upon it of the court in Capel v. Jones (6).

I will quit this part of the subject by citing the opinion of PARKE, B., in Parmiter v. Coupland (10). He is reported to have said (6 M. & W. at p. 108):

F "A publication without justification or lawful excuse, which is calculated to injure the reputation of another by exposing him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, is a libel. Whether the particular publication, the subject of inquiry, is of that character, and would be likely to produce that effect, is a question upon which a jury is to exercise their judgment, and pronounce their opinion as a question of fact."

G

The learned judge is here only speaking of libels which affect reputation and character, but I am not aware that those which affect a man's credit in his trade stand upon any different footing. I am, therefore, of opinion that if a publication, either standing alone, or taken in connection with other circumstances, is reasonably capable of a libellous construction, it is for a jury, and not for the court, to say

H whether a libellous construction should be put upon it.

The question being not what a court of law might understand by it, but what inferences the class of people to whom it is addressed would draw from the language used, it is properly and essentially a question of fact, and as such properly devolves upon a jury. I do not mean to assert that the jury is free to draw an inference of defamation whatever the language of the imputed libel may be. The court have

I the right and the duty to hold a check upon the action of the jury in such matters, and to see that the defamatory inference is one which, without doing violence to the language, can be reasonably drawn. But it has no right to go further and reject the defamatory inference because it is not a necessary inference or one which the court itself would draw. There is, I conceive, considerable danger in the court usurping the function of the jury, and by a too narrow criticism of the language of a publication rejecting inferences, which though perhaps not logical, are such as people of illogical minds, who are perhaps the majority, would draw. Then it must be remembered that the question of malice and the question whether certain language is or is not defamatory are distinct, and whatever is held not to be defamatory is equally not defamatory, though published with the most malicious intentions and objects. It is not difficult for a malicious man to injure his neighbours by carefully selected language, avoiding a direct charge, or anything like a necessary inference of discredit; and if your Lordships should hold the present publication to be innocent, you will, I fear, go far to invite such attempts. A

But, assuming that it is for the court and not for the jury to say whether the circular was libellous, I am, I confess, strongly of opinion that such a question ought to be answered in the affirmative. I doubt whether any man of business could read this circular, and not be led to the conclusion that the defendants had their misgivings as to the plaintiffs' solvency. I do not mean to say that there might not possibly be other reasons for refusing to take any of the plaintiffs' cheques on whatever branch they might be drawn, but the first and obvious reason would be that the defendants doubted if such cheques would be paid. In general mankind do not refuse to take any form of payment in respect of which they feel a confidence that it will, without difficulty, be convertible into money, and provided that a note, or cheque, or security for money, is known by them to be perfectly certain to be easily and promptly convertible into cash, it is quite beyond any experience that I possess to believe that such securities would be refused. It has been said in argument that there might be numerous reasons for refusing to take the plaintiffs' cheques besides the reason that their credit was doubtful, and that it is, therefore, unreasonable to pitch upon this last as the meaning to be conveyed by the defendant's circular. But although this has been said I have not heard any of these reasons stated or suggested, nor have I been able to imagine any of them, except perhaps the extra trouble involved in having to cash cheques on various branches of a country bank; and this interpretation of their meaning is excluded by the fact that the circular equally extends to cheques drawn on the Chichester branch, which there would have been no difficulty or trouble in cashing. But in whatever way the circular was capable of being interpreted, I still think that an imputation on the plaintiffs' credit would be the first and most obvious reason for it which would arise in the mind of anyone reading it. It must always be remembered that the persons to whom it was sent knew no more than the public at large, and had no other key to the meaning of the circular than would have been possessed by the first man in the street who might have read it if it had been posted on the walls of the town. It was admitted that if such a circular as this had been indiscriminately published, as by sticking it on a wall, it would have had the effect of damaging the plaintiffs' credit. B C D E F G

The responsibility for a publication may be affected by the mode in which, and the persons to whom, it is made; but the meaning of the words, and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, must be the same however published, and if the meaning and effect of the circular would have been injurious to the plaintiffs' credit if stuck upon a wall, why should it not have the same meaning and the same effect if received by a man in an envelope? I am not at this moment discussing whether the sending of this circular was in fact, under the circumstances, the publication of a libel. I have already said that provided it was done innocently as a matter of business, within the definition given by PARKE, B., in Toogood v. Spyring (8), it was a protected communication, and one which, without proof of actual malice, would not sustain this action. But I am assuming the contrary of all this. I am assuming that it was no innocent step taken in the course of business, but a wilful act done without need or necessity, and with intent to punish or injure the plaintiffs, and solely for that purpose, and so published. I am considering the question whether the circular contained imputations damaging to the plaintiffs' credit or not; and in this point of view I am quite unable to perceive why it should carry one meaning to a reader if posted on a wall, and if received by the same reader in an envelope should convey another and different meaning. H I

The innocence and lawfulness of this circular has been sustained in argument by some very ingenious reasoning. Suppose, it is said, that this paper had only

A been sent to one person, would it be libellous? The answer, I think, depends on the motive or object which dictated it; a libel does not require publication to more than one person. But then it is said, surely the defendants had a right to refuse the plaintiffs' cheques, and, if they had a right to do so, why had they not a right to say that they would do so? This mode of argument appears to me to beg the question. Every man has, but for the law of libel, a right to say or write what he pleases. His pen and tongue are his own, and the only law which restrains the use of them is the law of libel and slander. To assert, therefore, that in the case supposed a man has a right to issue a circular of this character is to assert that it would not be a libel if issued, which is the very point that has to be established. There are cases, no doubt, in which, although a man acts maliciously, or with a desire to annoy or injure another, he may not be responsible, because he is only exercising some right that belongs to him, such as erecting on his own land some structure of a kind which he knows will annoy his neighbour, for the sole purpose of effecting that result. Many other cases might be put in connection with positive right, the exercise of which does not cease to be lawful though the motive that dictates and shapes their exercise may be malicious. But the right of publishing statements which are injurious to another is not a right of this kind; it is a right only subject to the limitations of the law of libel, and if it exceed those limitations it becomes an actionable wrong. To say that a man is at liberty maliciously to injure another by a written publication, without any better excuse or occasion for making it than the indulgence of animosity, or passion, and that the injured man is without redress, is to say that the law of libel does not exist. Malice has always been held to be the gist of an action for libel, and the only difference between what is called a privileged occasion and one not so privileged is that the law infers malice in the latter case, while it requires proof of actual malice in the former, but when that proof has been given the right of action is complete whatever the occasion may be. Assuming that an imputation against character or credit in trade is untrue, injury to the plaintiff and malice on the part of the defendant are, in my opinion, the efficient elements of an actionable libel. All this is fully discussed in the judgment of BAYLEY, J., in Bromage v. Prosser (11).

F Then again it is said that the circular in terms said nothing about the plaintiffs' credit, and that it would be enlarging the language of it without warrant to construe it in a sense injurious to that credit. But the actual words of a publication are, in my opinion, by no means the limit of the ideas and impressions which they may be calculated to convey. Woolnoth v. Meadows (1) affords a good example of this, where it was held that words which not only did not charge a criminal offence, but on the face of them, indeed, repudiated such a charge, were nevertheless libellous as being calculated to convey to the hearers of them a criminal imputation.

"Whatever words have a tendency to hurt, or are calculated to prejudice a man who seeks his livelihood by any trade or business, are actionable":

H said BAYLEY, J., in Whittaker v. Bradley (12) (7 Dow. & Ry.K.B. at p. 650). In MR. HOLT's book on LIBEL the following is the second definition given of what constitutes a libel against a private person:

"Libels which have a tendency to injure him in his office, profession, calling, or trade."

I That this "tendency" is the true test of the publication being libellous or not, and not the mere primary meaning of the defendant to be gathered from the words he has used, is, I think, well established by authority. In Haire v. Wilson (13) the judge had left it to the jury to say whether the defendant intended to injure the plaintiff. This the court held to be wrong (9 B. & C. at p. 645):

"If the tendency of the publication was injurious to the plaintiff, then the law will presume that the defendant, by publishing it, intended to produce that injury which it was calculated to effect. If it had that tendency no doubt it was a libel":

said LITTLEDALE, J. In that case the intention of the defendant to injure the plaintiff was inferred from "the tendency" of his publication. This case is stronger against the defendant, for the hypothesis upon which I am considering whether the circular is libellous is that the defendant did actually intend to injure the plaintiff. A

It comes to this, therefore, in my opinion, that the only real question which arises in determining whether the language of this circular is libellous is whether it would be calculated to raise in the minds of those to whom it was addressed an imputation against the solvency of the plaintiffs or not. For the reasons I have already given I am of opinion that it is so calculated, and if it properly devolves upon your Lordships to say whether the language of the circular was libellous, I am of opinion that it was so. But this question is, in my view of the law, a question for the jury and not for the court, the language of the circular being capable of the construction which the plaintiffs have put on it in their innuendo. Upon the whole, then, I think this case ought to be again submitted to a jury. As to the language of the circular the question for the jury would be whether, putting such a meaning and construction on it as, in their opinion, would be put on it by the persons to whom it was addressed, an imputation against the plaintiffs' credit would be thereby conveyed; and, if so, they should find the circular to be in its language libellous, it being for the plaintiffs to establish that proposition to their satisfaction. But the main question for them would arise upon the circumstances under which, and the persons to whom, the circular was published. These matters should be left to the jury to enable them to judge and the court to determine whether the occasion was a privileged one or not, as was decided in Bromage v. Prosser (11). If the jury should find that the circular was innocently published in discharge of a duty, or as a matter of business within the definition given in Toogood v. Spyring (8), the publication would be privileged. The onus of establishing that it was so lies, I think, upon the defendants. A third question, as a matter of law, presents itself, whether, although the occasion was privileged, there was any actual malice on the defendants' part; but in the circumstances of this case that question hardly arises, except as a matter of form, for the considerations which would induce the jury to find the circular to have been issued innocently in discharge of a duty, must practically negative all actual malice in taking that step. I, therefore, think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed. B C D E F

LORD BLACKBURN.—On the trial evidence was given on both sides, and the case was left to the jury, who did not agree and were discharged. The plaintiffs desire that the case should go for trial before another jury. The defendants' contention is that they are entitled to judgment on the ground that if the jury had found in favour of the plaintiffs, every circumstance relating to the publication which the evidence could prove, and even though they had found that, in their opinion, the letter was libellous, the court ought to come to the conclusion that the letter published under those circumstances was no libel, and, acting on its own conclusion, give judgment for the defendants, not setting the verdict aside as not satisfactory, but letting it stand, and giving judgment for the defendants notwithstanding the verdict. If this is right it follows that the case ought not to be sent to another jury. The decision of the cause depends first on the question what is the province of the court in an action of libel, and whether, where the writing is such that opinions might differ as to whether it is libel or not, the court can give judgment for the defendant on the ground that, though the jury have found that, in their opinion, the writing is a libel, the court do not think it made out to be a libel. That is a question of great public interest. Secondly, the question is whether, supposing that this can be done, the state of the evidence in this case as to the publication is such that the court ought to come to the conclusion that this is no libel. This is of importance to the parties, but except in so far as it may illustrate the meaning of the first general proposition, it is not of general importance. G H I

I will first state my opinion on the first question. A libel for which an action will lie is defined to be a written statement published without lawful justification

- A or excuse, calculated to convey to those to whom it is published an imputation on the plaintiffs, injurious to them in their trade, or holding them up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule. It must be shown by evidence that there was a writing, and that it was published; and independently of all questions as to privilege, the manner of the publication, and the things relative to which the words are published, which the person publishing knew, or ought to have known, would influence those to whom
- B it was published in putting a meaning on the words, are all material in determining whether the writing is calculated to convey a libellous imputation. There are no words so plain that they may not be published with reference to such circumstances, and to such persons knowing those circumstances, as to convey a meaning very different from that which would be understood from the same words used under different circumstances.
- C I think that from the earliest times it has, by the law of England, been the province of the court to say whether words published in writing were a libel or not; and in order that a court of error might have before it the materials for enabling it to say whether the decision of the court below was right or not, the plaintiff was, by the old rules of pleading, required to place all those materials on which he relied upon the record. The words themselves must have been set out in the declaration
- D or indictment, in order that the court might be able to judge whether they were a libel or not; and this still remains the law: see Bradlaugh v. R. (14) and Harris v. Warre (15). In construing the words to see whether they are a libel, the court is, where nothing is alleged to give them an extended sense, to put that meaning on them which the words would be understood by ordinary persons to bear, and say whether the words so understood are calculated to convey an injurious imputation.
- E The question is not whether the defendant intended to convey that imputation; for if he without excuse or justification did what he knew, or ought to have known, was calculated to injure the plaintiff, he must be responsible, at least civilly, for its consequences, though his object might have been to injure another person than the plaintiff, or though he might have written in levity only. If there were circumstances relating to the publication which it was alleged caused the words to bear a
- F more extended sense than they would otherwise do, the law was that those must be stated on the record, in order to enable the court to judge whether the words understood with reference to those circumstances bore that more extended sense, or else those circumstances could not be looked at in favour of the plaintiff. The rule of pleading has been altered in that respect, but the law which gave rise to the old mode of pleading has not been altered. It never was disputed that there was much
- G which could only be decided by the jury. Whether the words as published bore the meaning alleged where there was an innuendo, or any libellous imputation where there was no innuendo, was a question which the defendant could raise on the general issue, and the jury must decide that question when raised.

There were, however, a series of decisions, the last and most important of which was the famous case of R. v. Shipley (16). The headnote, I think, very accurately

H states what was decided by the majority of the court (4 Doug.K.B. at p. 73):

“On the trial of an indictment for a libel the only questions for the jury are the fact of publication and the truth of the innuendoes. The question of libel or no libel is necessarily a question of law for the sole consideration of the court out of which the record comes, and on which the judge at the trial is not called upon to give his opinion to the jury.”

I WILLES, J., dissented from the reasons given by LORD MANSFIELD, though agreeing in his conclusion that there should be a new trial. It seems to me clear that while LORD MANSFIELD held that the question of libel or no libel was one exclusively for the court, WILLES, J., held that it was also a question for the jury, but he did not hold it to be a question exclusively for the jury.

It is no longer material whether LORD MANSFIELD or WILLES, J., was right in his view of the law as it stood in 1784, for by the Libel Act, 1792, it is enacted by s. 1 what the law shall be in future. The legislature adopted the substance of the judgment of WILLES, J., and from that time, A.D. 1792, there can be no doubt that A a defendant cannot be convicted of libel unless the jury find that the tendency of the publication was libellous. But the legislature, passing an enactment in favour of defendants, did not intend to put them in a worse position than before, nor to make the verdict of a jury conclusive against them. Nor did they enact that the judge might not in this, as in other criminal cases, direct the jury to acquit B because he thought that the case had failed in law. It would, I think, have been very injudicious to do so. And by s. 4, the legislature provided that the defendant should still, though found guilty by the jury, have the power to take the opinion of the court on the question of law, by moving in arrest of judgment, as before the C Act. R. v. Shipley (16) was a criminal proceeding at the instance of the Crown, and the Act of 1792 is in terms confined to such proceedings. But though, no doubt, the court has more power to set aside verdicts in civil cases, there is no D reason why the functions of the court and jury should be different in civil proceedings and in criminal proceedings for a libel. Accordingly, it has been for some years generally thought that the law in civil actions for libel was the same as it had been expressly enacted it was to be in criminal proceedings for libel. It certainly had always been my impression that there was a difference between the position of the prosecutor or plaintiff and that of the defendant. The onus always was on D the prosecutor or plaintiff to show that the words conveyed the libellous imputation, and, if he failed to satisfy that onus, whether he had done so or not being a question for the court, the defendant was always entitled to go free. Since the Act of 1792 at least, however the law may have been before, the prosecutor or plaintiff must also satisfy a jury that the words are such, and so published as to convey the libellous imputation. If the defendant can get either the court or the jury to be in E his favour he succeeds. The prosecutor or plaintiff cannot succeed unless he gets both the court and the jury to decide for him. It seems to me that when the court come to decide whether a particular set of words published under particular circumstances are or are not libellous, they have to decide a very different question from that which they have to decide when determining whether another tribunal, whether a jury or another set of judges, might not unreasonably hold such words to be F libellous. In fact, whenever a verdict has passed against a defendant in a case of libel, and judgment has been given in the court below, those who bring their writ of error on the ground that there was no libel assert that both the jury and the court below have gone wrong, but they are not called upon to say that the words were incapable of conveying the libellous imputation; it is enough if they can make out to the satisfaction of the court of error that the onus of showing that C they do convey such an imputation is not satisfied, and there are numerous cases in which, after a verdict for the plaintiff and judgment for him, that judgment has been set aside in error.

It was argued that if the words were capable at all of conveying the libellous imputations the plaintiff had a right to have the question left to the jury. Only two authorities were produced. Some expressions used by WILDE, C.J., in deliver- H ing the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Sturt v. Blagg (7) were cited, but I think they do not bear the meaning supposed. No question of this kind was before the court. The other case relied on as an authority was Hart v. Wall (17), where LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and LINDLEY, J., set aside a nonsuit entered by ARCHIBALD, J., after consulting QUAIN, J. I am unable on perusing the report of that case to make out what was the meaning the letters were supposed to be capable I of bearing which it was held would be libellous. It may be that it was thought not only that it was for the jury to find the meaning, and also that they were not bound to find for the plaintiff, whatever the court might think, unless they thought the publication such that the meaning was calculated to convey a libellous imputation, which I think is the law, but also that if the jury found these questions for the plaintiff it was conclusive on the court, unless they could see that the words were incapable of conveying such an imputation; and if such was the decision in Hart v. Wall (17) it is an authority for the plaintiffs, and, as far as I know, the

A only one. I think there is authority against it. No one can read the tract the publication of which was the subject of the indictment in R. v. Shipley (16), and say that the words were incapable of conveying a suggestion that the people should arm and drill themselves, so as to be prepared by force to resist the government so long as Parliament was managed by a few great lords or wealthy men. Yet the Court of King's Bench unanimously arrested the judgment, which, I think, can only have been on the ground that, though the words were capable of conveying that seditious meaning, the court thought that the prosecution had not satisfied the onus which lay on them to show that they were so published as to be calculated to convey it. I think that subsequent decisions show that this principle has been acted upon.

I do not think it necessary to cite any other cases than Hearne v. Stowell (5) and Goldstein v. Foss (4) there referred to. Hearne v. Stowell (5) was a peculiar case. The alleged libel in that case, in its natural sense, and without any innuendo at all, imputed to the plaintiff conduct which, if believed, would in the opinion of the jury have injured his reputation by exposing him to hatred, contempt, and ridicule, and therefore was a libel. The court took a different view, and acted on their own view, and arrested the judgment. The plaintiff might have brought error, and plausibly enough have asked a court of error to say that they agreed with the jury, and not with the Court of Queen's Bench, but he acquiesced in the judgment.

Goldstein v. Foss (4) contained counts in which the libel stood thus:

"Correspondence 1825. Society of Guardians for the Protection of Trade against Swindlers and Sharpers. I am directed to inform you that the persons under-named, using the firms of Goldstein, Castles & Co., and Benjamin Porter Baker, are reported to this society as improper to be proposed to be balloted for as members thereof."

On this ABBOTT, C.J., after pointing out that the innuendo that the plaintiff was a swindler was too large, but that it might under these counts be rejected as surplusage, says (6 B. & C. at p. 159):

"Then is the import of the libel itself such as can be made the subject of an action? There may be fixed arbitrary rules which prevent the election of certain persons as members of the society; persons of a certain age, or certain trades, may be excluded; and there may be so many reasons why a person may be deemed unfit to become a member of the society, without casting any injurious reflection upon him, that I think we cannot possibly say with any degree of certainty that such was the intention with which the alleged libel was published."

I may observe here that I agree with what was argued at the Bar, that Fisher v. Clement (18) shows that the real question was not what was the intention with which the libel was published, but what was the tendency of the libel as published, and, consequently, that ABBOTT, C.J., if correctly reported, made the same verbal slip in Goldstein v. Foss (4) which he afterwards made in Fisher v. Clement (18). But, subject to this slight correction, I think that ABBOTT, C.J., here states, not only that it was a question for the court whether the publication was shown to be libellous, but correctly states the principle on which the court is to proceed, viz., that unless the plaintiff has so far satisfied the onus which lies on him to show it to be a libel, that the court can with sufficient certainty say that the writing has a libellous tendency, they should not say so. The plaintiff in Goldstein v. Foss (4) did not submit to this judgment. He brought error, but the judgment was affirmed.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 61, was intended to remove the difficulties which the plaintiff had in putting a real cause of action on the record with sufficient technical precision. But it was not intended to alter the law, or to deprive the defendant of his right to ask the court to say that words alleged to be a libel, or actionable slander, though found by the jury to be so, were not so in the judgment of the court. It deprived him of his right to move in arrest of judgment, for the materials on which the question whether the words, written or spoken, were used in the defamatory sense has to be decided are no longer on the record. A But when the proof is complete, and all that can be properly found on that proof in favour of the plaintiff is found for him, the court have, I think, exactly the same power that they had before, and if they are of opinion that, if all which could be found had been put on the record under the old system, the judgment would have been arrested, they should give judgment for the defendant. This was done, and I think rightly done, in Mulligan v. Cole (19). B

This brings me to the question on which there has been a difference of opinion among the judges of the Court of Appeal, and on which I have felt, and still feel, great difficulty, namely, whether the evidence was such as would justify a jury in finding that the publication was such, and so made, that the court would not say after verdict for the plaintiff, that they thought it not sufficiently shown to be a libel. There can be no doubt that the defendants were not required to take cheques drawn on this bank on account of any debts due to them, or in any other way whatsoever, and had a right to refuse to do so. No reason was needed to justify such a refusal. Such a refusal could not be made without using words which, whether written or spoken, without sufficient occasion to give rise to a privilege, would be actionable if their tendency would be to cast a doubt on the credit of the bank. C I think, however, that there are so many reasons why a person may refuse to take on account the cheques drawn on a particular bank, that acting in the spirit of what LORD TENTERDEN said in Goldstein v. Foss (4) the court could not say that the letter, which in terms goes no farther than merely to state the fact, was libellous as tending to impute a doubt of the credit of the bank. No doubt some people might guess that the refusal was on that ground, but as BRETT, L.J., says, it is unreasonable that when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized on to give a defamatory sense to the document. D E

I do not think it libellous by itself to state the fact; but I quite agree that such a statement might be published in such a way and to such persons as to show that its natural tendency would be to convey an impression that the person refusing to take the cheques on that bank did doubt its credit, and then it would be libellous. Both THESIGER and CORRON, L.JJ., in this case intimate an opinion that any publication so made that it would come to persons who had no concern at all with the defendants' proceedings, but might possibly be interested, as customers of the bank, in considering whether the bank was in good credit, would have a tendency to injure the credit of the bank in the opinion of such persons. I have not been able quite to make up my mind on this, and prefer to point out that the question does not arise. I think if the letter had been sent to only one person, and that person was in the habit of sending many such cheques to the defendants, it could not be said to be libellous. It was sent to a great many persons who were in the habit of sending some, but very few, cheques to the defendants, and the inconvenience which was occasioned by having to keep such cheques till the Saturday was so slight that I cannot but view the conduct of the defendants with moral disapprobation; but unless some good legal reason can be suggested for holding what they did actionable, the judgment should be affirmed. F G H

One more point has to be considered. A publication calculated to convey an actionable imputation is, prima facie, a libel; the law, as it is technically said, implying malice, or, as I should prefer to say, the law being that the person who so publishes is responsible for the natural consequences of his act. But if the occasion is such that there was either a duty, though perhaps only of imperfect obligation, or a right to make the publication, it is said that the occasion rebuts the presumption of malice, but that malice may be proved—or I should prefer to say, that he is not answerable for it, so long as he is acting in compliance with that duty or exercising that right—and the burthen of proof is on those who allege that he was not so acting. In this case, if any customer of Messrs. Henty who had been in the habit of remitting such cheques to them and having them taken on account of his debts had had such cheques returned to him, that customer would have had good reason to complain that this was done. If, therefore, Messrs. Henty had I

- A resolved to take no such cheques in future, there was a moral obligation on them either to tell such a one that the cheques would not be taken in future, or when he brought them to take them, and warn him to bring no more; and the occasion was one which, I think, gave rise both to a duty to their customers and a right in themselves to give the warning, and the occasion was privileged. But I think there was evidence that they did not send the circular because they had resolved to
- B take no cheques, but resolved to take no cheques in order that they might send the circular. If that was found by a jury to be the fact, I think they could not shelter themselves from the consequences of publishing the letter, if it was a libel, by an occasion which they sought. I think, therefore, that the only question is whether there was here evidence from which such facts could be found as, in the opinion of the court, would satisfy the onus which lies on the plaintiffs to show that this publication had a libellous tendency; and as I am of opinion that there was not, I think that the judgment should be affirmed.
- C

- LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. I think it is quite possible that some of the people to whom the circular was sent might suppose that its language was intended to convey to
- D them a quiet hint that the affairs of the bank were not altogether in a satisfactory condition. That, however, is not the meaning of the words of the circular upon any possible construction of them; it is an inference drawn by the reader from the fact notified in the circular, which does not per se constitute a libel. If I were satisfied that an inference injurious to the credit of the bank would naturally and necessarily suggest itself to the mind of any person of average intelligence on
- E reading the circular, I should hold that it had a libellous tendency, although the language used is not in itself libellous. But besides the one injurious inference suggested by the appellants there are many other inferences of an innocent character, which naturally might, and probably would, suggest themselves to any reader of the circular who was not induced to put a malignant construction upon it by some cause such as is not proved to have existed in the case of any one of the
- F persons to whom it was sent. I am accordingly of opinion that, while the language of the circular is, in the sense which I have indicated, capable of suggesting the injurious imputation complained of, the appellants have failed to prove facts and circumstances leading to the conclusion that it must have been so understood by those who received it, or, in other words, have failed to show that it had a libellous tendency. As I have been unable, after carefully considering the authorities bearing
- G on the case, to differ from the law as stated by LORD BLACKBURN, it necessarily follows that, in my opinion, the judgment of the court below is right.

- LORD BRAMWELL.—In this case the plaintiffs have stated as their cause of action a publication relating to them of the defendants to which they, the plaintiffs, have by innuendo attached a particular meaning, namely, that it imputed to them
- H insolvency in their trade or business. They have proceeded to trial, and have given no evidence in support of their innuendo except such, if any, as is afforded by the publication itself. The Court of Appeal have dealt with the case as if there had been no innuendo, and the case had come before them on demurrer. They have held that the publication is no libel, and have given judgment for the defendants. I have no doubt that it was competent for the court so to deal with
- I the case. Whether they have come to a right conclusion in holding that the publication was no libel may be a question, but that they had jurisdiction and power so to decide there cannot be a doubt. They could not indeed hold that it was a libel, unless expressly referred to them by demurrer; but it is clear that they could hold that it was not a libel, either on demurrer, or formerly on motion in arrest of judgment, or on such a proceeding as that which brought the question before them: Hearne v. Stowell (5); Goldstein v. Foss (4).

But though they had this power or jurisdiction, it is still for your Lordships to say whether they came to a right conclusion. The alleged libel is a notice sent by the defendants to their customers that they will not receive in payment cheques drawn on any branches of the plaintiffs' bank. I omit all mention of the innuendo, because no evidence was given in support of it beyond proof of the notice itself. But it is contended for the plaintiffs that the notice proves or shows that the defendants charged that the plaintiffs were insolvent, not to be relied on to meet the cheques drawn on them, and not to be trusted to cash the cheques drawn on them by their customers. No doubt, if it means this, or if this is the inference reasonably to be drawn from it, it is libellous, because it is admitted on all hands that the common expression "meaning" is incorrect and inadequate, for the question is not what the writer of any alleged libel means, but what is the meaning of the words he has used; and more than that, for though the words themselves may be harmless, if a libellous inference may be drawn from them as a natural or necessary consequence they are libellous.

I wish to avoid a definition or the laying down of a rule as much as possible, but I think that what I have said is correct, and that the question in this case is whether such inference is to be drawn here, for the words in themselves are perfectly harmless, they contain nothing of or about the plaintiffs, their character or conduct. All that the words say is that the defendants will not take in payment cheques on them. As to insolvency, the words infer insolvency or they do not. If not there is no libel. If they infer insolvency they infer that and nothing else, or they infer two or more of several things of which insolvency is one—that is to say, that the defendants refuse the cheques for some reason or reasons, of which insolvency may or may not be one. It seems to me impossible to say that they infer insolvency and insolvency only, and that that, and nothing else, was the cause why the defendants refuse to take in payment cheques on the plaintiffs' branches.

If so, two questions remain for consideration: Is insolvency one matter which may be inferred? If it, but many others, may be, is the publication libellous? In the first place, to my mind no one ought to infer from the words an imputation or charge of insolvency. I say this with hesitation, because I think that no one else has said so yet, but I must say that it is strongly confirmed by what counsel for the respondents pointed out. No witness is called who received the circular and acted upon it as imputing insolvency. I do not say that any witness could have been properly asked what he inferred from the circular, but in reference to the damages he might have been asked if he drew his cash from the plaintiffs, and did it because of the circular. Further it is to be remembered that it is admitted that the defendants did not mean to impute insolvency. Fortified by these considerations, I cannot but think that this circular neither charged nor gave rise to the inference of insolvency, and that, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

I have now dealt with two out of the three meanings or inferences which may be found in, or drawn from, the circular. I will suppose that I am wrong in thinking that no inference of insolvency can be drawn from it, and will now deal with the third, viz., that the inference to be drawn from the circular was that the defendants, for some reason or reasons, of which the insolvency of the plaintiffs might be one, would not take in payment cheques on the plaintiffs' branches. Is that actionable? I think not. I cannot think that an action lies in such a case. I think the defamer is he who of many inferences chooses a defamatory one. He should inquire what the truth is before judging. No doubt he often will not; but what then? The risk of his not doing so is one which we must run if we live among our fellow-creatures. I do not see how the world's affairs could be conducted if it were not so. Take this case for an example. The defendants had a perfect right to do the thing that they did, namely, refuse to take cheques on the plaintiffs. They had a right to tell their customers. If when each customer came who brought a cheque on the plaintiffs they had refused to take it, they would have done and said what they have done and said now, with this difference, that their customers would have had a right to complain that they were not warned beforehand. But if this circular is a libel, they would have uttered an actionable slander, for an action will lie for words imputing insolvency to a trader. Their

A refusal of the cheque and giving their reasons would be saying that, as it is, they have written.

What then were they to do? If they had said they did not mean to impute insolvency, it would have been argued that it showed that was the natural inference from the letter. If they had said that they had had a difference with the plaintiffs, the same remark might be made, or that that was not the reason. Besides, they were under no obligation to give a reason. Or it might be argued that, even if that were the reason, the legitimate inference, or an inference, was that the plaintiffs conducted their business in a bad or inconvenient way. In short, it seems to me that the defendants had a right to do and say what they did and said; and if people will draw from their doings a possible, for I am now assuming it possible, inference of insolvency in the plaintiffs, it is no fault of the defendants. I have said that the defendants had a right to say and do what they did. By that I did not mean that they had any especial right. All the Queen's subjects have a right to refuse payment by cheques on the plaintiffs' bank, and to say so: or, if I am wrong in giving this right to all the Queen's subjects, at least the defendants had it. I say then that the words are harmless in themselves, and that they do not import or justify the inference of the plaintiffs' insolvency. If I am wrong in this, I say that it is only one of several things which they import, or of which they justify the inference; that no action lies in such a case; that if it would lie against anyone not interested to do and say what the defendants did and said, it does not lie against them who were so interested, and did and said no more than they had a right to do.

In this way the question of privilege arises in a sense. If they had such right it seems to me that their motive is immaterial, and that they might do what they did though out of anger or malice. If I am wrong in the above, and if the inference, or an inference, to be drawn from the words used is the imputation of insolvency to the plaintiffs, and if the action is otherwise maintainable, I think there is no defence on the ground of privilege. I think that follows from the defendants' own contention. They say that they did not believe the plaintiffs to be insolvent, and had no intention to say so, and that if that is the inference to be drawn from their language, their language is wrong. But they have no privilege to use wrong language; they have only a right to say what they believe. It may be that by mistake they have said what they do not believe, but for that mistake they are liable. I am of opinion, however, that for the above reasons they are not liable, and that the plaintiffs have no cause of action, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

FOAKES v. BEER

[Reported 9 App. Cas. 605; 54 L.J.Q.B. 130; 51 L.T. 833;
33 W.R. 233]

Accord and Satisfaction—Judgment debt—Payment of smaller sum under agreement between parties—Right of judgment creditor to interest.

The payment, in accordance with an agreement not under seal, of a series of instalments amounting to a total sum less than the amount of a debt does not, in the absence of consideration for the relinquishment of the balance, constitute a satisfaction of the debt.

By s. 17 of the Judgments Act, 1838: "Every judgment debt shall carry interest at the rate of four pounds per centum per annum from the time of entering up the judgment . . . until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment."

The respondent having brought an action against the appellant and obtained judgment for a specific sum, a parol agreement in writing was made between the parties, by which, in consideration of the appellant paying part of the sum on the signing of the agreement and the remainder by equal half-yearly instalments, the respondent undertook not to take any proceedings on the judgment. The appellant paid all the instalments, and after payment of the last the respondent made a claim for interest from the date of the judgment.

Held: under s. 17 of the Act of 1838 interest on the amount of the judgment debt formed part of the debt owed by the appellant to the respondent; the amount paid under the agreement was, therefore, less than the judgment debt, and, in the absence of any consideration given by the appellant to the respondent for relinquishing her claim to interest, the agreement did not prevent the respondent from claiming the interest.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported 11 Q.B.D. 221, allowing an appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division and directing that judgment be entered for the plaintiff (the present respondent) for £302 19s. 6d. A

On Aug. 11, 1875, the respondent recovered judgment against the appellant in the Court of Exchequer for the sum of £2,077 17s. 2d. for debt and £13 1s. 10d. for costs in an action wherein the respondent was plaintiff and the appellant defendant, and judgment was entered for the sum of £2,090 19s. On Dec. 21, 1876, an agreement in writing was entered into between the respondent and the appellant, as follows: B

"Memorandum of agreement made this twenty-first day of December, 1876, between Julia Beer, of Douglas Villas, High Road, Lee, in the county of Kent, widow, of the one part, and John Weston Foakes, of No. 10, South Street, Grosvenor Square, in the county of Middlesex, M.D., of the other part. Whereas the said John Weston Foakes is indebted to the said Julia Beer and she has obtained a judgment in Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, Exchequer Division, for the sum of £2,090 19s. And whereas the said John Weston Foakes has requested the said Julia Beer to give him time in which to pay such judgment, which she has agreed to do on the following conditions. Now this agreement witnesseth that, in consideration of the said John Weston Foakes paying to the said Julia Beer on the signing of this agreement the sum of £500, the receipt whereof she doth hereby acknowledge, in part satisfaction of the said judgment debt of £2,090 19s., and on condition of his paying to her or her executors, administrators, assigns, or nominee, the sum of £150 on the first day of July and the first day of January or within one calendar month after each of the said days respectively in every year until the whole of the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied, the first of such payments to be made on the first day of July next, then she the said Julia Beer hereby undertakes and agrees that she, her executors, administrators, or assigns, will not take any proceedings whatever on the said judgment. As witness the hands of the said parties.—John W. Foakes. Julia Beer." C D E F

At the time of entering into the agreement the appellant paid to the respondent the sum of £500, and subsequently paid various other sums, which amounted to the sum of £2,090 19s.

On July 1, 1882, the respondent applied to the master at chambers, under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 19, for leave to issue execution against the appellant for a balance alleged by the respondent to be still due for interest in respect of the judgment debt of £2,090 19s., which the appellant refused to pay [R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 19, was annulled by R.S.C. (No. 3), 1926]. Upon the hearing of the application, it was ordered by the master that this issue be tried between the respondent and the appellant: "Whether any and what amount is now due upon the said judgment, signed on Aug. 11, 1875, in the late Court of Exchequer of Pleas, for the sum of £2,090 19s." The issue came on for trial before CAVE, J., and a common jury, in Middlesex, on Feb. 22, 1883. G H

At the trial Mr. Mackreth, the respondent's solicitor, was called as a witness for the respondent, and he produced a certified copy of the judgment of Aug. 11, 1875, and an account in writing showing the balance alleged to be due from the appellant to the respondent. The certified copy of the judgment and the account were put in evidence on behalf of the respondent. The agreement of Dec. 21, 1876, was put in evidence, and it was admitted that all the instalments mentioned in the agreement had been paid up to January, 1882, inclusive. It was also admitted that after May 25, 1882, and before July 1, 1882, the appellant paid to the respondent a further sum of £90 19s. The learned judge directed the jury to find that the appellant had paid all the sums which by the said agreement of Dec. 21, 1876, he undertook to pay and within the times therein specified, and I

A stated that he was of opinion that, whether the judgment was satisfied or not, the respondent was not entitled to issue execution on the judgment against the appellant. On Mar. 2, 1883, counsel for the respondent moved for and obtained a rule nisi for a new trial of the said issue. On May 2, 1883, the rule came on for argument in the Queen's Bench Division, before WATKIN WILLIAMS and MATHEW, JJ., who discharged the same. The respondent gave notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal, and on June 23, 1883, the appeal came on for argument before SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and LINDLEY and FRY, L.JJ., when the order now appealed from was made.

May 16, 1884. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—Upon the construction of the agreement of Dec. 21, 1876, I cannot differ from the conclusion in which both the courts below were agreed. If the operative part could properly be controlled by the recitals, I think there would be much reason to say that the only thing contemplated by the recitals was giving time for payment, without any relinquishment, on the part of the judgment creditor, of any portion of the amount recoverable, whether for principal or interest under the judgment. But the agreement of the judgment creditor which follows the recitals is, that she "will not take any proceedings whatever on the judgment," if a certain condition is fulfilled.

E What is that condition? Payment of the sum of £150 in every half year, "until the whole of the said sum of £2,090 19s.," the aggregate amount of the principal debt and costs, for which judgment had been entered, "shall have been fully paid and satisfied." A particular "sum" is here mentioned, which does not include the interest then due or future interest. Whatever was meant to be payable under this agreement was clearly to be payable by half-yearly instalments

F of £150 each; any other construction must necessarily make the conditional promise nugatory. But to say that the half-yearly payments were to continue till the whole sum of £2,090 19s. "and interest thereon" should have been fully paid and satisfied, would be to introduce very important words into the agreement which are not there, and of which I cannot say that they are necessarily implied. Although, therefore, I may, as indeed I do, very much doubt whether

G the effect of the agreement as a conditional waiver of the interest to which by law she was entitled under the judgment was really present to the mind of the judgment creditor, still I cannot deny that it might have that effect, if capable of being legally enforced.

But the question remains whether the agreement is capable of being legally enforced. Not being under seal, it cannot be legally enforced against the respondent unless she received consideration for it from the appellant, or unless,

H though without consideration, it operates by way of accord and satisfaction, so as to extinguish the claim for interest. What is the consideration? On the face of the agreement none is expressed except a present payment of £500 on account and in part of the larger debt then due and payable by law under the judgment. The appellant did not contract to pay the future instalments of £150 each at

I the times therein mentioned; much less did he give any new security in the shape of negotiable paper, or in any other form. The promise de futuro was only that of the respondent, that, if the half-yearly payments of £150 each were regularly paid, she would "take no proceedings whatever on the judgment." No doubt, if the appellant had been under no antecedent obligation to pay the whole debt, his fulfilment of the condition might have imported some consideration on his part for that promise. But he was under that antecedent obligation; and payment at those deferred dates, by the forbearance and indulgence of the creditor, of the residue of the principal debt and costs could not, in my opinion, be a consideration for the relinquishment of interest and discharge of the judgment unless the payment of the £500 at the time of signing the agreement was such a consideration. A

As to accord and satisfaction, in point of fact there could be no complete satisfaction so long as any future instalment remained payable; and I do not see how any new payments on account could operate in law as a satisfaction ad interim conditionally upon other payments being afterwards duly made, unless there was a consideration sufficient to support the agreement while still unexecuted. Nor was anything in fact done by the respondent in this case, on the receipt of the last payment, which could be tantamount to an acquittance, if the agreement did not previously bind her. The question, therefore, is nakedly raised by this appeal whether your Lordships are now prepared, not only to overrule as contrary to law the doctrine stated by SIR EDWARD COKE to have been laid down by all the judges of the Common Pleas in Pinnel's Case (1) (5 Co. Rep. 117 a) in 1602, and repeated in his note to LITTLETON, s. 344 (Co. Litt. 212 b), but to treat a prospective agreement, not under seal, for satisfaction of a debt by a series of payments on account to a total amount less than the whole debt, as binding in law, provided those payments are regularly made, the case not being one of a composition with a common debtor agreed to inter se by several creditors. I prefer so to state the question instead of treating it, as it was put at the Bar, as depending on the authority of Cumber v. Wane (2), decided in 1721. B C D

It may well be that distinctions, which in later cases have been held sufficient to exclude the application of that doctrine, existed and were improperly disregarded in Cumber v. Wane (2), and yet that the doctrine itself may be law, rightly recognised in Cumber v. Wane (2), and not really contradicted by any later authorities; and this appears to me to be the true state of the case. The doctrine itself, as laid down by SIR EDWARD COKE, may have been criticised as questionable in principle by some persons whose opinions are entitled to respect, but it has never been judicially overruled. On the contrary, I think it has always, since the 16th century, been accepted as law. If so, I cannot think that your Lordships would do right if you were now to reverse as erroneous a judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeding upon a doctrine which has been accepted as part of the law of England for 280 years. E F

The doctrine, as stated in Pinnel's Case (1) is

"that payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction of a greater cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum." G

As stated in COKE ON LITTLETON, 212 b, it is:

"where the condition is for payment of £20, the obligor or feoffor cannot at the time appointed pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater." H

He added, what is beyond controversy, that an acquittance under seal, in full satisfaction of the whole, would, under like circumstances, be valid and binding. The distinction between the effect of a deed under seal and that of an agreement by parol, or by writing not under seal, may seem arbitrary, but is established in our law; nor is it really unreasonable or practically inconvenient that the law should require particular solemnities to give to a gratuitous contract the force of a binding obligation. If the question be, as in the actual state of the law I think it is, whether consideration is or is not given in a case of this kind by the debtor who pays down part of the debt presently due from him, for a promise by the creditor to relinquish, after certain further payments on account, the residue of the debt, I cannot say that I think consideration is given, in the sense in which I have always understood that word as used in our law. It might be, and indeed I think it would be, an improvement in our law, if a release or acquittance of the whole debt on payment of any sum which the creditor might be content to I

- A receive by way of accord and satisfaction, though less than the whole, were held to be generally binding, though not under seal; nor should I be unwilling to see equal force given to a prospective agreement like the present, in writing, though not under seal; but I think it impossible, without refinements which practically alter the sense of the word, to treat such a release or acquittance as supported by any new consideration proceeding from the debtor.
- B All the authorities subsequent to Cumber v. Wane (2) which were relied upon by the appellant, such as Sibree v. Tripp (3), Curlewis v. Clark (4), and Goddard v. O'Brien (5), have proceeded upon the distinction that, by giving negotiable paper or otherwise, there had been some new consideration for a new agreement, distinct from mere money payments in or towards discharge of the original liability. I think it unnecessary to go through those cases, or to examine the particular grounds upon which each of them was decided. There are no such facts in the case now before your Lordships. What is called "any benefit, or even any legal possibility of benefit," in MR. SMITH's notes to Cumber v. Wane (2) (1 SMITH, L.C., 8th Edn., 366) is not, as I conceive, that sort of benefit which a creditor may derive from getting payment of part of the money due to him from a debtor who might otherwise keep him at arm's length, or possibly become insolvent, but is some independent benefit, actual or contingent, of a kind which in law might be a good and valuable consideration for any other sort of agreement not under seal. My conclusion is that the order appealed from should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs and I so move your Lordships.

- LORD BLACKBURN.—The first question raised is what was the true construction of the memorandum of agreement made on Dec. 21, 1876. What was it that the parties by that writing agreed to? The appellant contends that they meant that, on payment down of £500, and payment within a month after July 1, and Jan. 1 in each ensuing year of £150 until the sum of £2,090 19s. was paid, the judgment for that sum and interest should be satisfied, for an agreement to take no proceedings on the judgment is equivalent to treating it as satisfied. This construction of the memorandum requires that after the tenth payment of £150 there should be a further payment of £90 19s. made within the next six months. This is the construction which all the courts below have put upon the memorandum. The respondent contends that the true construction is that time was to be given on those conditions for the five years, the judgment being, in default of any one payment, enforceable for whatever was still unpaid with interest from the date the judgment was signed, but that the interest was not intended to be forgiven at all.
- G If this is the true construction of the agreement, the judgment appealed against is right and should be affirmed, whether the reason on which the Court of Appeal founded its judgment was right or not. I am of opinion, however, that the courts below, who on this point were unanimous, put the true construction on the memorandum. I do not think the question free from difficulty. It would have
- H been easy to have expressed in unmistakable words that, on payment down of £500, and punctual payment at the rate of £300 a year till £2,090 19s. was paid, the judgment should not be enforced either for principal or interest; or language might have been used which should equally clearly have expressed that, though time was to be given, interest was to be paid in addition to the instalments. The words actually used are such that I think it is quite possible that the two parties
- I put a different construction on them at the time; but I think the words "till the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied" cannot be construed as meaning "till that sum, with interest from the day judgment was signed, shall have been fully paid and satisfied;" nor can the promise "not to take any proceedings whatever on the judgment" be cut down to meaning any proceedings except those necessary to enforce payment of interest.

I think, therefore, that it is necessary to consider the ground on which the Court of Appeal based their judgment, and to say whether the agreement can be enforced. I construe it as accepting and taking £500 in satisfaction of the whole

£2,090 19s., subject to the condition that, unless the balance of the principal debt was paid by the instalments, the whole might be enforced with interest. If instead of £500 in money it had been a horse valued at £500, or a promissory note for £500, the authorities are that it would have been a good satisfaction, but it is said to be otherwise as it was money. This is a question, I think, of difficulty. LORD COKE says (Co. Litt. 212 b):

For this he cites Pinnel's Case (1). That was an action on a bond for £16, conditional for the payment of £8 10s. on Nov. 11, 1600. Plea, that defendant, at plaintiff's request, before the said day, to wit, on Oct. 1, paid to the plaintiff £5 2s. 2d., which the plaintiff accepted in full satisfaction of the £8 10s. The plaintiff had judgment for the insufficient pleading. But, though this was so, LORD COKE reports that it was resolved by the whole Court of Common Pleas,

"that payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction of a greater cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum; but the gift of a horse, a hawk, or a robe, etc., in satisfaction is good, for it shall be intended that a horse, hawk, or robe might be more beneficial to the plaintiff than the money in respect of some circumstance, or otherwise the plaintiff would not have accepted of it in satisfaction. But when the whole sum is due, by no intendment the acceptance of a parcel can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff; but in the case at Bar it was resolved that the payment and acceptance of parcel before the day in satisfaction of the whole would be a good satisfaction in regard of circumstance of time; for peradventure parcel of it before the day would be more beneficial to him than the whole at the day, and the value of the satisfaction is not material; so if I am bound in £20 to pay you £10 at Westminster, and you request me to pay £5 at the day at York, and you will accept it in full satisfaction for the whole £10, it is a good satisfaction for the whole, for the expenses to pay it at York is sufficient satisfaction."

There are two things here resolved. First, that where a matter paid and accepted in satisfaction of a debt certain might by any possibility be more beneficial to the creditor than his debt, the court will not inquire into the adequacy of the consideration. If the creditor, without any fraud, accepted it in satisfaction when it was not a sufficient satisfaction, it was his own fault; and that payment before the day might be more beneficial, and consequently that the plea was in substance good; and this must have been decided in the case. There is a second point stated to have been resolved, namely, "that payment of a lesser sum on the day cannot be any satisfaction of the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum."

This was certainly not necessary for the decision of the case; but, though the resolution of the Court of Common Pleas was only a dictum, it seems to me clear that LORD COKE deliberately adopted the dictum, and the great weight of his authority makes it necessary to be cautious before saying that what he deliberately adopted as law was a mistake, and though I cannot find that in any subsequent case this dictum has been made the ground of the decision, except in Fitch v. Sutton (6), as to which I shall make some remarks later, and in Down v. Hatcher (7), as to which PARKE, B., in Cooper v. Parker (8) said, "Whenever the question may arise

A as to whether Down v. Hatcher (7) is good law, I should have a great deal to say against it," yet there certainly are cases in which great judges have treated the dictum in Pinnel's Case (1) as good law.

For instance, in Sibree v. Tripp (3), PARKE, B., says (15 M. & W. at p. 33):

B "It is clear that if the claim be a liquidated and ascertained sum, payment of part cannot be satisfaction of the whole, although it may, under certain circumstances, be evidence of a gift of the remainder."

ALDERSON, B., in the same case says (ibid. at pp. 37, 38):

C "It is undoubtedly true that payment of a portion of a liquidated demand, in the same manner as the whole liquidated demand ought to be paid, is payment only in part, because it is not one bargain but two, viz., payment of part, and an agreement without consideration to give up the residue. The courts might very well have held the contrary, and have left the matter to the agreement of the parties, but undoubtedly the law is so settled."

D After such strong expressions of opinion, I doubt much whether any judge sitting in a court of first instance would be justified in treating the question as open. But, as this has very seldom, if at all, been the ground of the decision, even in a court of first instance, and certainly never been the ground of a decision in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, still less in this House, I did think it open to your Lordships' House to re-consider this question. Notwithstanding the very high authority of LORD COKE, I think it is not the fact that to accept prompt payment of a part only of a liquidated demand can never be more beneficial than to insist on payment of the whole. And if it be not the fact, it cannot be apparent to the judges.

E I will first examine the authorities. If a defendant pleaded the general issue the plaintiff could join issue at once, and, if the case was not defended, get his verdict at the next assizes; but by pleading a special plea the plaintiff was obliged to reply, and the defendant often caused the plaintiff, merely by the delay occasioned by replying, to lose an assize. If the application was one to which he could demur he made this sure. Strangely enough it seems long to have been thought that, if the defendant kept within reasonable bounds, neither he nor his lawyers were to blame in getting time in this way, by a sham plea that a chattel was given and accepted in satisfaction of the debt. The recognised forms were giving and accepting in satisfaction a beaver hat (Young v. Rudd (9)) or a pipe of wine (CHITTY ON PLEADINGS (7th edn.), vol. 3, p. 92). All this is now antiquated. But while it continued to be the practice, pleas founded on the first part of the resolution in Pinnel's Case (1) were very common, and that law was perfectly trite. No one supposed for a moment that a beaver hat was really given and accepted, but everyone knew that the law was that, if it was really given and accepted, it was a good satisfaction. But special pleas founded on the other resolution in Pinnel's Case (1), on what I have ventured to call the dictum, were certainly not common.

II I doubt whether a real defence of this sort was ever specially pleaded. When there really was a question whether a debt was satisfied by payment of a smaller sum the defendant pleaded the general issue, and, if it was proved to the satisfaction of the jury that a smaller sum had been paid and accepted in satisfaction of a greater, if objection was raised the jury might perhaps, as suggested by HOLROYD, J., in Thomas v. Heathorn (10), find that the circumstances were such that the legal effect was to be as if the whole was paid down, and a portion thrown back as a god's-penny. This, however, seems to me to be an unsatisfactory and artificial way of avoiding the effect of the dictum, and it could not be applied to such an agreement as that now before this House. For whatever reason it was, I know of no case in which the question was raised whether a payment of a lesser sum could be satisfaction of a liquidated demand, from Pinnel's Case (1) down to Cumber v. Wane (2) in a period of 119 years.

I In Adams v. Tapling (11), where the plea was bad for many other reasons, it is reported to have been said by the court that,

"in covenant, where the damages are uncertain, and to be recovered, as in this case, a lesser thing may be done in satisfaction, and there accord and satisfaction is a good plea."

No doubt this is one of the cases which PARKE, B., would have cited in support of his opinion that Down v. Hatcher (7) was not good law. The court are said to have gone on to recognise the dictum in Pinnel's Case (1), or at least not to dissent from it, but it was not the ground of their decision. In every other reported case which I have seen the question arose on a demurrer to a replication to what was obviously a sham or dilatory plea.

Some doubt has been made as to what the pleadings in Cumber v. Wane (2) really were. I have obtained the record [Queen's Bench (Plea side) Plea Roll, 5 Geo. 1, Trinity, ro. 173]. The plea is that after the promises aforesaid, and before the issuing of the writ, it was agreed between the said George and Edward Cumber that he, the said George,

"daret eidem Edwardo Cumber quamdā notam in script vocatam 'a promissory note' manu propria ipsius Georgii subscript pr. solucon eidem Edwardo Cumber vel ordini quique librarum," fourteen days after date, in full satisfaction and exoneration of the premises and promises, which said note in writing the said George then gave to the said Edward Cumber, and the said Edward Cumber then and there received from the said George the said note in full satisfaction and discharge of the premises and promises. The replication is that

"the said George did not give to him Edward any note in writing called a promissory note with the hand of him George subscribed for the payment to him Edward or his order of £5 fourteen days after date in full satisfaction and discharge of the premises and promises."

To this there is a demurrer and judgment in the Common Pleas for the plaintiff "that the replication was good in law." The reporter, oddly enough, says (1 Stra. 426) that there was "an immaterial replication." The effect of the replication is to put in issue the substance of the defence, namely the giving in satisfaction (Young v. Rudd (9)), and certainly that was not immaterial. But for some reason, I do not stop to inquire what, PRATT, C.J., prefers to base the judgment, affirming that of the Common Pleas, on the supposed badness of the plea rather than on the sufficiency of the replication. It is impossible to doubt that the note, which it is averred in the plea was given in satisfaction, was a negotiable note; and, therefore, this case is in direct conflict with Sibree v. Tripp (3).

Two cases require to be carefully considered. The first is Heathcote v. Crookshanks (12). The plea there pleaded would, I think, now be held perfectly good: see Norman v. Thompson (13), but BULLER, J., seems to have thought otherwise. He says (2 Term Rep. at p. 28):

"Thirdly it was said that all the creditors were bound by this agreement to forbear, but that is not stated by the plea. It is only alleged that they agreed to take a certain proportion, but that is a nudum pactum unless they had afterwards accepted it. In the case in which Cumber v. Wane (2) was denied to be law (Hardcastle v. Howard (14)) the party actually accepted. But, as the plaintiff in the present case refused to take less than the whole demand, the plea is clearly bad."

That decision goes entirely on the ground that accord without satisfaction is not a good plea. I do not think it can be fairly said that BULLER, J., meant, by saying "that is a nudum pactum unless they had afterwards accepted it," to express an opinion that, if the dividend had been accepted, it would have been a good satisfaction. But he certainly expressed no opinion the other way. In Fitch v. Sutton (6) not only did the plaintiff not accept the payment of the dividend in satisfaction, but refused to accept it at all unless the defendant promised to pay him the balance when of ability, and the defendant assented, and made the promise

A required, so that but for the fact that other creditors were parties to the composition there could have been no defence. There was no point of pleading in that case, the whole being open under the general issue.

In Steinman v. Magnus (15) it was pretty well admitted by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., that the decision in Fitch v. Sutton (6) would have been the other way if they had understood the evidence as the reporter did. But though this misapprehension
B of the judges as to the facts, and the absence of any acceptance of the dividend, greatly weaken the weight of Fitch v. Sutton (6), still it remains that LORD ELLENBOROUGH, a very great judge indeed, did, however hasty or unnecessary it may have been to express such an opinion, say (5 East, at p. 232):

C "It is impossible to contend that acceptance of £17 10s. is an extinguishment of a debt of £50. There must be some consideration for the relinquishment of the residue; something collateral to show a possibility of benefit to the party relinquishing his further claim, otherwise the agreement is nudum pactum. But the mere promise to pay the rest when of ability put the plaintiff in no better condition than he was before. It was expressly determined in Cumber v. Wane (2) that acceptance of a security for a lesser sum cannot be pleaded in satisfaction of a similar security for a greater; and though that case was said
D by me in argument in Heathcote v. Crookshanks (12) to have been denied to be law, and in confirmation of that BULLER, J., afterwards referred to a case stated to be that of Hardcastle v. Howard (14), yet I cannot find any case of that sort, and none has been now referred to. On the contrary, the decision in Cumber v. Wane (2) is directly supported by the authority of Pinnel's Case (1), which never appears to have been questioned."

E I must observe that, whether Cumber v. Wane (2) was or was not denied to be law in Hardcastle v. Howard (14), it certainly was denied to be law in Sibree v. Tripp (3); and that, though it is quite true that Pinnel's Case (1), as far as regards the point actually raised in the case, has not only never been questioned, but often F assented to, I am not aware that in any case before Fitch v. Sutton (6), unless it be Cumber v. Wane (2), has that part of it which I venture to call the dictum ever been acted upon; and, as I have pointed out, had it not been for the composition with other creditors, there could have been no defence in Fitch v. Sutton (6), whether the dictum in Pinnel's Case (1) was right or wrong. Still this is an authority, and I have no doubt that it was on the ground of this authority, and the adhesion of BAYLEY, J., to it in Thomas v. Heathorn (10), that PARKE and
G ALDERSON, BB., expressed themselves as they did in the passages which I have cited from Sibree v. Tripp (3). I think that their expressions justify MR. J. W. SMITH in laying it down, as he does in his note to Cumber v. Wane (2) (1 SMITH, L.C., 2nd Edn.), that

H "a liquidated and undisputed money demand, of which the day of payment is passed, not founded upon a bill of exchange or promissory note, cannot, even with the consent of the creditor, be discharged by mere payment by the debtor of a smaller amount in money in the same manner as he was bound to pay the whole."

I am inclined to think that this was settled in a court of the first instance. I think, however, that it was originally a mistake.

I What principally weighs with me in thinking that LORD COKE made a mistake of fact is my conviction that all men of business, whether merchants or tradesmen, do every day recognise and act on the ground that prompt payment of a part of their demand may be more beneficial to them than it would be to insist on their rights and enforce payment of the whole. Even where the debtor is perfectly solvent, and sure to pay at last, this often is so. Where the credit of the debtor is doubtful it must be more so. I had persuaded myself that there was no such long-continued action on this dictum as to render it improper in this House to re-consider the question. I had written my reasons for so thinking; but, as they were not satisfactory to the other noble and learned Lords who heard the case, I do not now repeat them nor persist in them. I assent to the judgment proposed, though it is not that which I had originally thought proper. A

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. I regret that I have been unable to adopt that construction of the memorandum of agreement which has commended itself to your Lordships as well as to the judges of the Court of Appeal. It appears to me that the respondent did not intend to pass, and did not pass, from her legal claim for interest on the judgment debt due to her from the appellant. She undertakes not to take proceedings on the judgment provided the stipulated terms instalments are regularly paid, "until the whole of the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied." But these words, "the said sum," ought, in my opinion, to be construed as referring to the sum of £2,090 19s. previously described as being contained in a judgment of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, and, therefore, bearing interest ex lege. The whole context of the memorandum appears to me to be consistent with this view, and to point strongly to the inference that there was no agreement, or even proposal, that the respondent should make any abatement of her legal claims, or do more than give her debtor time, on the conditions expressed, "to pay such judgment." I must assume, however, that I have wrongly construed the memorandum of agreement, and that its language imports that the respondent was to abstain from taking proceedings on the judgment if and when instalments to the amount of £2,090 19s. had been duly and regularly paid. Upon that assumption I am still of opinion that the respondent ought to prevail, on the simple ground that on that view of the memorandum her agreement to abate part of her claim was nudum pactum, for which the appellant gave no legal consideration, I do not think it necessary to consider whether it would still be open to this House, if so advised, to overrule the doctrine of Cumber v. Wane (2) and Pinnel's Case (1), because I am not prepared to disturb that doctrine. Nor do I think it necessary to occupy the time of the House with a detailed explanation of the considerations which have led me to that result, seeing that I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and also in the opinion about to be delivered by LORD FITZGERALD, which I have had the advantage of reading. B C D E F

LORD FITZGERALD.—The first question is as to the true construction of the memorandum of agreement of Dec. 21, 1876, and I express my opinion upon it with the greatest diffidence. My excuse for expressing my opinion upon it is that I feel rather strongly on the point. G

The memorandum is, it may be observed, unilateral, for Dr. Foakes by it assumes no obligation. The first recital is that Mrs. Beer had obtained a judgment against Dr. Foakes for a sum of £2,090 19s. The judgment would not at common law per se entitle the plaintiff to interest, but s. 17 of the Judgments Act, 1838, provides: H

"Every judgment debt shall carry interest at four pounds per centum per annum from the time of entering up the judgment . . . until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment." I

This right to interest is different from interest arising on contract, or which a jury may give as damages, or may withhold. It is a clear statutory right, arising immediately on entering up the judgment, and continuing until the judgment debt is fully paid. The position of the parties at the date of the agreement then was that Dr. Foakes owed Mrs. Beer the principal sum of £2,090 19s. recovered by a judgment which carried interest at 4 per cent., arising de die in diem as a statutory right, and then—that is, at the time of the agreement—amounting to £113 16s. 2d. The agreement then contains this recital: J

"And whereas the said J. W. Foakes has requested the said Julia Beer to give him time in which to pay such judgment, which she has agreed to do on the following conditions."

A He does not ask for any remission of any portion of his obligation, he solicits only time for payment, and she agrees to give him that time and no more. It seems to me clear and free from doubt that "such judgment" in this recital would, if there was no more to guide us, mean the judgment debt with its statutable interest at 4 per cent. The language of the recital and of the whole agreement seems to be that of the defendant's solicitor, as we find in the evidence of Mr. Mackreth [plaintiff's solicitor] this statement: "The agreement was prepared by Smith and sent to me, and I approved of it on behalf of Mrs. Beer."

B Returning to the language of the agreement, it is remarkable that Dr. Foakes undertakes by it no obligation whatever; he does not bind himself to pay any instalment to her or to her "nominee," and it was not necessary that he should, for I can entertain no doubt that, if what is called the "condition" for payment of the instalments had not been fulfilled, then Mrs. Beer could have enforced the whole residue of her demand for principal and the interest which had accrued, by execution on the judgment. Dr. Foakes enters into no obligation to pay to her "nominee," and this seems to displace in fact the foundation of the judgment of the Divisional Court, where WATKIN WILLIAMS, J., said:

D "The doctrine is that an agreement to pay a less sum in satisfaction of a debt is without consideration. The English law forbids such an agreement. That is the law in its naked simplicity. But I think a very little departure from the mere agreement to pay a less sum will make the agreement good. If the creditor says, 'You owe me a large sum of money, I am willing to accede to your request for time, but you must enter into an agreement in writing, at your expense,' as it would be, 'and you shall pay the money to me or E to any person I may name, at my election,' that is enough I think to make this agreement not a nudum pactum."

There is no such thing in the agreement here. MATHEW, J., adds:

F "It is noticeable that the agreement is framed so that it casts an obligation which would not otherwise have existed. The agreement to pay the creditor's nominee renders it a document available as a security."

It would seem, to me at least, that the terms of the agreement had never been properly conveyed to the minds of the judges, for in fact Dr. Foakes assumed no greater obligation than the law imposed on him in respect of the judgment. The expressed condition is the payment to Mrs. Beer "of the sum of £500 in part satisfaction of the said judgment debt of £2,090 19s."; and again I should repeat here that the last words would mean the debt and the right to interest which it carried, if there is nothing subsequent to impose a different meaning. The term "satisfaction" is specially applicable to a judgment. You could not in former times simply plead payment to a scire facias on a judgment; the plea should show satisfaction. The judgment would not be satisfied on the payment of the £2,090 19s., but only on payment of that sum and the interest. The agreement then provides as a condition for the payment of the instalments of £150 "until the whole of the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied." The whole difficulty arises on this passage. If in place of using the word "sum" it had used "judgment" or "judgment debt," in my opinion there could have been but one construction, namely, that "judgment" or "judgment debt" meant the principal sum of £2,090 19s., with interest at 4 per cent.

I Having regard to what the parties were at, why should we not read "the said sum of £2,090 19s." by the light of the antecedent parts of the same agreement as meaning "the said judgment for £2,090 19s.," and thus do full and complete justice, and not deprive Mrs. Beer of about £350 as justly due to her as the £2,090 19s., and which it is to me manifest she never intended, and was never asked, to relinquish? There is a special recital indicating what the parties intended, namely, "time on certain conditions," but without a word as to relinquishing any part of the plaintiff's demand, and if the subsequent words are more general, we shall limit and qualify them by the special language of the recital. Dr. Foakes did not ask for any remission; he asked for time, and for time alone, and we ought to assume that when his solicitor prepared and furnished the memorandum of agreement, he did not intend by its language that any part of Mrs. Beer's demand was to be released. Mr. Mackreth says that in the course of negotiations "interest was never mentioned at all in reference to that agreement." She adopted the language of the memorandum, and it became hers, but was it such as to lead Dr. Foakes to understand that Mrs. Beer agreed, on performance of the condition, to give up her claim to interest? A B

I think we ought not to adopt such a conclusion. There are many authorities for the proposition that you may limit the general words of release by the antecedent recitals, so as to effectuate that alone which was within the intention of the parties. I might refer to a number of cases; for example, Thorpe v. Thorpe (16), C where it was said,

"where there are general words only in a release they shall be taken most strongly against the releasor, but where there is a particular recital and general words follow, there the general words shall be qualified by the special words."

Applying that rule to the present case, you may limit the general words at the conclusion of the memorandum to the giving of time alone; that is to say, if "judgment debt of £2,090 19s." means the sum of £2,090 19s. and nothing more, then that Mrs. Beer agrees to give time for the payment of the principal debt of £2,090 19s. by the instalments and at the time indicated, and that pending that arrangement she would "not take any proceedings whatever on the said judgment." This would give effect to every word and leave the interest untouched, which, if the principal is to be paid by instalments, could not well be ascertained until the time had been reached for the payment of the last instalment. There is nothing in the memorandum, it should be observed, to prevent Dr. Foakes from coming in at any time and discharging the whole principal before the instalments became payable. Upon the construction of the memorandum I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. D E F

The second question now presents itself, but with my views on the first it is not actually necessary for me to express any opinion upon it, but it seems more satisfactory that I should do so. Assuming that I have fallen into error in interpreting the agreement, and that it is to be read that if Dr. Foakes should pay the actual sum of £2,090 19s. by instalments according to the condition she would relinquish her statutable debt for interest and not issue execution on the judgment to recover it, is such an agreement nudum pactum, and incapable, therefore, of being enforced? I have listened with much interest to the opinion of LORD BLACKBURN, who has gone, as usual to the very foundation, and I regret that I have been unable to assist him in overturning the resolution of the Court of Common Pleas as reported by LORD COKE in Pinnel's Case (1) or in expunging from the books the infinitesimal remains of Cumber v. Wane (2). It seems to me doubtful whether the question arises which he has presented, namely, whether payment of part of a debt ascertained by judgment can be a satisfaction of the whole? In the case before us the whole of the £2,090 19s., the principal of the judgment, has been paid to the last farthing. The interpretation put by the judges of the courts below, and adopted by the Lord Chancellor and LORD BLACKBURN, on the memorandum, seems to me to divide it, in effect, into two stipulations, the first being that, if Dr. Foakes should pay down £500 and the remainder of the actual sum of £2,090 19s. in the manner prescribed, Mrs. Beer would so accept it, and pending the payments would take no proceedings on the judgment, and the second being that, if the £2,090 19s. should be paid in the manner indicated, she would relinquish her claim for interest, and would not take any proceedings whatever on the judgment to enforce that interest. G H I

The question is whether there is any sufficient legal consideration for the relinquishment of the debt for interest. I am clearly of opinion that there is not.

A LORD BLACKBURN has shown us very clearly that the resolution in Pinnel's Case (1) was not necessary for the decision of that case, and that the principle on which it seems to rest does not appear to have been made the foundation of any subsequent decision of the Exchequer Chamber or of this House; and further, that some of the distinctions which have been engrafted on it make the rule itself absurd. But it seems to me that it is not the rule which is absurd, but some of those distinctions, emanating from the anxiety of judges to limit the operation of a rule which they considered often worked injustice. That resolution in Pinnel's Case (1) has never been overruled; for 282 years it seems to have been adopted by our judges. During the whole of that period it seems to have been understood and taken to be part of our law that the payment of part of a debt then due and payable cannot alone be the foundation of a parol satisfaction and discharge of the residue, as it brings no advantage to the creditor, and there is no consideration moving from the debtor, who has done no more than partially to perform his obligation. Though it may not have been made the subject of actual decision, yet we find that every judge in this country who has had occasion to deal with the proposition states the law to be so.

C In Ireland it has always been so received, and in Drogheda Corpn. v. Fairtlough (17) LEFROY, C.J., thus expresses himself, and I may say that his language is entitled to very considerable weight. That very learned judge thus states the law :

"There is also a failure of evidence of the consideration for the contract to remove the rule of the common law that payment of a less sum cannot be a satisfaction of a greater liquidated sum, unless there is some further advantage accompanying the payment."

E In another part of his judgment he puts the proposition thus :

"The payment merely of a less sum, not being in pursuance of any contract by deed, cannot by the common law be deemed to be a satisfaction of a greater liquidated sum, but the law will allow the payment of a smaller sum to be a satisfaction of a greater liquidated sum if there be any collateral advantage, however small, to the creditor attending the transaction."

F The question did arise directly in that case, but the plea failed in other points, and it was not necessary, therefore, actually to decide it. I refer to it as showing how a judge of great experience considered the law to stand. I am not aware of any decision that controverts this position, and the textbooks uniformly present it thus: that "the payment of part of a liquidated and ascertained sum is in law no satisfaction of the whole."

G The proposition itself is but a part of a rule of our law which governs many of the daily relations of life, nuda pactio obligationem non parit. And again the law says that nudum pactum est ubi nulla subest causa præter conventionem. I should hesitate before coming to a decision which might be a serious inroad on that rule, but I concur with my noble and learned friend that it would have been wiser and better if the resolution in Pinnel's Case (1) had never been come to, and there had been no occasion for the long list of decisions supporting composition with a creditor on the rather artificial consideration of the mutual consent of other creditors. We find the law to have been accepted as stated for a great length of time, and I apprehend that it is not now within our province to overturn it. The short question then is, in relation to a judgment debt payable immediately on which the creditor is entitled to have execution: Is the payment by the debtor of a part a sufficient consideration to support a parol agreement by the judgment creditor not to take any proceedings whatever on the judgment for the residue? In my opinion, it is not, and I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Disclaimer—Lease—Conditions of granting leave to disclaim—Benefit to bankrupt's estate accruing through trustee's possession of demised property—Contemplation of beneficial occupation.

In giving leave to a trustee in bankruptcy to disclaim a lease belonging to the bankrupt, the court will only order the trustee, as a condition of granting leave, to pay the landlord compensation for the use and occupation of the demised property where some special circumstances exist, e.g., where the trustee has got a pecuniary benefit for the bankrupt's estate by keeping possession of the demised property, or where the occupation was contemplated as likely to produce a benefit.

Appeal by the West Derby and Everton Perpetual Benefit Building Society from a decision of BACON, C.J., in bankruptcy.

In August, 1875, John Knight, a manure manufacturer at Farnworth, Lancashire, and a member of the West Derby and Everton Perpetual Benefit Building Society, in which he held 750 shares, received an advance from the society of £7,500, which, according to the rules of the society, was to be repaid with interest at 7 per cent. per annum by monthly instalments of £71 17s. 6d. each, each instalment being payable at a monthly meeting of the society, held on the second Wednesday in the month. By a mortgage dated Aug. 3, 1875, Knight, in consideration of the advance, granted his freehold manufactory, with certain machinery and fixtures therein, to the trustees of the building society, subject to a proviso for entering up a receipt for the moneys secured by the deed upon due performance of the rules of the society. It was by the said indenture provided and declared that, in case the mortgagor should at any time thereafter neglect or refuse, for three monthly meetings of the society, to pay all subscriptions, interest, fines, and other moneys, or in the event of the mortgagor becoming bankrupt, the mortgagees might enter into possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the hereditaments, and sell and dispose of the same. And for better securing the payments which by rules of the society ought to be made by the mortgagor, it was thereby agreed and declared that, if the mortgagees should at any time, by virtue thereof, or of the rules of the society, become entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents, and the mortgagor, his

A executors, administrators, or assigns, should then or afterwards be in occupation of the whole or part of the premises, he or they should during such occupation be tenant thereof from month to month to the mortgagees at a clear monthly rent of such a sum as should be equal in amount to the moneys that ought to be paid monthly by him or them for subscriptions, interest, fines, and other moneys under the rules, and that such tenancy should commence on the day up to which such
B subscriptions, etc., should have been paid, and that the rent for the period intervening between the time of such commencement of tenancy and the day on which the mortgagees were entitled to enter into possession should be payable and paid on such last-mentioned day, and that the monthly rent due upon and subsequently to such last-mentioned day should become due monthly in advance, and should be payable at the place, on the day, and during the hours, where and when the
C monthly meetings of the society should be held; the first payment to become due on the day when the mortgagees should first be entitled to possession or receipt of rents. All moneys received as rent were to be accepted in or towards satisfaction of the subscriptions, interest, fines, and moneys then in arrear or payable under the rules or the mortgage, so far as the moneys received should extend. It was also provided that the mortgagees might, after giving fourteen days' previous
D notice of their intention so to do, enter upon and take possession of the property, and determine the tenancy. Upon Oct. 12, 1881, a memorandum of further charge to secure an additional advance of £1,600 was endorsed upon the said mortgage deed, whereby the monthly subscriptions were raised to £87 4s. 2d. Neither the mortgage deed nor the memorandum was registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

On Dec. 2, 1881, Knight having been in default at three monthly meetings,
E and being in occupation of the mortgaged property, a distress was levied on behalf of the society upon the debtor's property for £664 14s., in respect of rent or subscriptions and other payments due and in arrear. On the same day a bankruptcy petition was filed against the debtor, based upon an act of bankruptcy committed on Nov. 26. He was adjudicated a bankrupt on Dec. 5 in the Liverpool County Court, and at the first meeting of the creditors, on Dec. 31, Lewis Voisey
F and Thomas Hayes Sheen were appointed trustees, and entered into possession of the mortgaged property.

On Jan. 11, 1882, another distress for rent or subscriptions was levied by the trustees of the society for £255 15s. 5d. By an agreement of Jan. 14, entered into between the trustees of the society and the trustees in bankruptcy, it was provided that the stock-in-trade, which had been seized by the trustees of the society under
G their distresses, should be sold under the direction of the two sets of trustees, without prejudice to the rights of any of the parties, and that the net proceeds should be paid into the Adelphi Bank at Liverpool, in the joint names of both sets of trustees. Within fourteen days after the money should have been paid into the bank the trustees of the bankruptcy were to give up all claim to it, or to take steps to establish their claim, and prosecute the same with all due diligence. In the H event of their not making any claim within the fourteen days, they were to do all things in their power to facilitate the payment out of the money to trustees of the society. It was further provided:

"Nothing herein contained, nor any delay which has taken, or will take place, shall in any way prejudice the trustees of the building society."

I The stock-in-trade was, accordingly, sold, and the proceeds, amounting to £1,774, paid into the bank in the joint names.

On Feb. 9 a third distress was levied by the society for £127 10s. 4d., a further sum due to them by Knight. On Mar. 21, on the application of the trustees in the bankruptcy, the county court judge made an order declaring the attornment clause and the distresses levied under it void as against them. On May 8 the Chief Judge, on appeal, reversed the decision of the county court judge, and held that the distresses were valid; and on July 20 his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal; Re Knight, Ex parte Voisey (1). On May 15 the society levied a fourth distress for £375 17s. 6d., which sum had become due to them from Knight since the last distress. A

On May 18 another agreement was entered into between the two sets of trustees, by which it was provided that the loose effects at the bankrupt's works, which the trustees in the bankruptcy had advertised for sale, and which had been distrained upon by the society, should be sold by the trustees of the bankruptcy, and the proceeds paid into the bank in the joint names, as provided in the former agreement, B

"and that the moneys now and hereafter to be in the said bank shall be applied in payment of the distresses issued by the building society . . . so far as such distresses are not held void, and that the men in possession under the building society's distress shall withdraw from possession. Provided always, that nothing contained in this agreement shall prevent the bankrupt's trustees contesting the validity of the last distress if they shall be so advised." C

The loose effects were then sold, and the proceeds paid into the bank in the joint names.

On Aug. 16, 1882, the trustees in bankruptcy gave notice that they should apply to the county court on Aug. 25 for an order giving them leave to disclaim the tenancy created by the attornment clause upon such terms as to the court might seem just. This application was heard by the judge on Aug. 25. The building society contended that, as a condition of obtaining leave to disclaim, the trustees in bankruptcy ought to be ordered to pay to the society all the monthly payments of rent (including fines) which had accrued due under the terms of the mortgage deed from the date of the adjudication down to the date of the disclaimer. Leave to disclaim was given in the terms expressed in the following declaration contained in the order which was drawn up and dated Oct. 13, 1882: D

"It is declared that the trustees of the society are entitled to be paid the sum of £664 (being the amount of the monthly rent under the attornment clause distrained for on Dec. 2, 1881) and are entitled to be paid as and for the monthly rent under the attornment clause the sum of £87 4s. 2d. per month (being the amount of the monthly subscriptions payable to the society by the bankrupt under the provisions of the mortgage and further charge) commencing from the last rent comprised in the distress made on Dec. 2, 1881, and ending on Aug. 25, 1882 (the rent current on the last-mentioned day to be apportioned to that day), together with the fines payable by the rules of the society, such fines to run until the proceeds of the sales held in pursuance of the agreements of Jan. 14 and May 18, 1882, were from time to time paid into the bank." E F

It was ordered that the account of the monthly rent should be taken by the registrar of the court, who should certify the amount payable to the trustees of the society, and that the registrar should also tax and allow the costs of the trustees of the society of and incident to the distresses. And it was ordered that the amount so certified to be payable to the trustees of the society, and allowed them for costs of the distresses, should be paid to the trustees of the society out of the moneys paid into the bank under the two agreements. It was further ordered that, if those moneys should be insufficient to satisfy the payments thereinbefore directed, the deficiency should be paid by the trustees of the bankrupt out of the estate of the bankrupt, and that, if the moneys paid into the bank should be more than sufficient, the surplus should be paid out to the trustees of the bankrupt as part of his estate. The registrar afterwards certified that the amount payable to the society for monthly rent under the terms of the order was £1,581 2s. 3d. The total amount of the four distresses was £1,423 8s. 3d. The bankrupt's trustees had been in possession of the mortgaged property until July 10, 1882, but it did not appear that the estate of the bankrupt had derived any benefit from their occupation. H I

A On appeal to BACON, C.J., the building society contended that they ought to have been allowed the fines payable under the society's rules, not merely until the payments into the bank in the joint names, but until the date of actual payment to the society, and also that the monthly rent should be paid to the society down to the date when the disclaimer was executed by the bankrupt's trustees. The appeal was heard in November, 1882, and BACON, C.J., affirmed the decision of the county court judge. The building society appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and J. E. Linklater for the building society.

Winslow, Q.C., and Birrell for the bankrupt's trustees.

C SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—Whether the building society have or have not got more than they are entitled to I will not say. I am quite satisfied that they have got at least as much as they are entitled to, and that is all that it is necessary for us to decide.

D Rule 28 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1871, cannot mean that in every case of disclaimer the disclaimer shall not be executed or take effect unless the landlord is put in the same position up to the date of its execution as if no disclaimer had been executed, because s. 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, says that the disclaimer shall relate back to the date of the adjudication [but see now s. 54 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which provides that the disclaimer shall operate as from the date of disclaimer]. Therefore, if the rule applies, it enables the court to impose terms on the trustee only when a special case is made out. In Re Turner, Ex parte Ladbury (2) a special case was made out, the exact extent of which I do not know. It appears by the report of the case in the LAW TIMES, which as far as I can judge is the best report of the three I have looked at, viz., the LAW REPORTS, the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS, and the LAW TIMES REPORTS, that the trustee had kept possession of the demised property which was supposed to be of considerable value and of some value over and above an equitable mortgage upon it; that he had sold the equity of redemption for a considerable sum; that the purchaser was unable to complete his contract and had forfeited part of his deposit in order to be let off his bargain; and that the sum so forfeited had gone to increase the bankrupt's estate. It also appears that the landlord had been kept out of possession, how I do not know. Whether there was no proviso for re-entry or some clause to hinder the re-entry does not appear. That being so, it was held, not that the landlord was entitled to his rent up to the date of the disclaimer, but that he was entitled to some compensation for the use and occupation of the property by the trustee during the time he was kept out of the estate, and in the opinion of the Court of Appeal the compensation which had been awarded him by the registrar was not too much. That is all that is decided in Ex parte Ladbury (2). If that is so, we are only following Ex parte Ladbury (2) in saying that the landlord must make out some special case. I am not going to limit it to such a case as Ex parte Ladbury (2), that is, to a case where a trustee has got a pecuniary benefit for the bankrupt's estate by keeping possession of the demised property. There may be other cases, and I wish, so far as I can, not to fetter the court by laying down any definite limit as to the nature of the cases in which terms ought to be imposed on the trustee; but that there must be something special I am quite clear.

1 That being so, what have we here? In the first place, the relation between the parties is not the ordinary relation of landlord and tenant, but it is the ordinary relation of mortgagee and mortgagor. The nature of that relation is well known. In equity the mortgagor was owner of the estate, and the mortgagee was only entitled to a charge upon it (I am speaking roughly); at law the mortgagee was the legal owner of the estate (I am now speaking of freehold estates), and the mortgagor was what was called "tenant at will," a very peculiar kind of tenancy. That was the legal relationship between the parties. The relation in equity was totally different. In an ordinary case, there being no rent reserved, the tenant at will did not pay any rent, and was not liable to pay any, but you might superadd to that legal relationship an express agreement for a tenancy, as was done in the present case, in which a monthly tenancy was created at a monthly rent. That, no doubt, altered the legal relation between the parties, but it did not alter the equitable relation. The rent, if paid, was in equity paid on account of principal and interest; and if it exceeded the interest it would go in reduction of the principal. It was the subject-matter of account between the mortgagee and mortgagor. Therefore, in equity, the mortgagee remained only a chargee, and the mortgagor remained the owner of the estate, notwithstanding this variation in the ordinary legal relation between them. That is the true position of the parties.

We have in this case a reservation to the mortgagees of a right to take possession after fourteen days' notice. When the mortgagees took possession there was a change in the relation of the parties at equity as well as at law. At law the mortgagees became the owners in possession, and in equity they became mortgagees in possession, entitled to certain rights as regards possession, and subject to certain liabilities. The mortgagor became bankrupt. Then the mortgagees said: "We claim our rent." We must look to what the rent really was, because here again there is a great distinction between the case of the ordinary landlord and tenant, when the rent is what is agreed upon between the parties as the sum of money fairly payable for the occupation of the demised property, and what I will call a fancy rent—that is, a rent fixed, not with regard to what the tenant can afford to pay, or ought to pay, for the occupation of the property, but a rent fixed with regard to the amount payable for interest on a mortgage debt, or, as in the present case, the mortgagees being a building society, for the interest and fines. In an ordinary case, where the rent fixed by the attornment clause really represents the interest on the mortgage debt, it may not be a tenth of the annual value of the property. But here, if the mortgagor was in default, and the fines were added, it would be much more.

On looking at the report of the case when it was before the court on a previous occasion, Re Knight, Ex parte Voisey (1), it seems that the rent in that event would certainly amount to the full value of the property, and perhaps to something more, though not so much more as to lead the court to think that it was not intended to be a bona fide rent. It is plain, therefore, that if the rent is more than the value of the property, and it is fixed, not with regard to that value, but with regard to other circumstances, viz., in order to secure by distress the due payment of interest and fines, the keeping of the mortgagees out of possession does not inflict upon them any injury equivalent to the amount of the rent reserved. Then, again, in the present case, the mortgagees were not kept out of possession; they could have entered at any time after fourteen days' notice. The remaining out of possession was a voluntary abstinence on their part, because they thought it would be for their advantage to distrain for a sum larger than they could obtain by letting the property to a tenant. Therefore, whether you consider the real relation between the parties, it not being the ordinary one of landlord and tenant, or whether you consider the circumstance that the mortgagees might have taken possession at the moment after fourteen days' notice, it does not appear to me that they have suffered any special injury. On the contrary, by the terms of the order of the county court, they appear to have obtained a very considerable benefit by being allowed to distrain after the bankruptcy on the goods of the bankrupt for the amount reserved to them as rent.

That being so, I can see no reason whatever for imposing further terms on the trustee than those imposed by that order, which amounted in substance to this, that the trustees are to pay all the rent for which distresses were levied, and something more. Under these circumstances, I think the building society are not entitled to complain of the order, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The complaint made by the building society is that under the power given to the court by r. 28, to impose terms on the trustee in a bankruptcy, when he applies for leave to disclaim a lease of the bankrupt, the court ought to have given the society more than they have got under

A the present order. The argument was carried to a very great length, and I should hardly have thought it necessary to deal with the case but for the fact that it was contended that when there was an application for leave to disclaim, the trustee ought to be put under the terms of paying the whole of the rent reserved by the lease which he disclaimed up to the date of the execution of the disclaimer. That would be entirely contrary to the provisions of the Act. The Act, by throwing back the effect of the disclaimer to the date of the adjudication [but see now s. 54 (2) of the Act of 1914, mentioned supra], relieves the trustee, as from the date of the adjudication, from the consequences of the lease having vested in him. To say that in every case when a trustee applies for leave to disclaim a lease he should be put on the terms of paying the rent, as if the disclaimer took effect only from the date of its execution, would be to vary and repeal the Act.

C In certain cases the court has, and in my opinion rightly, put the trustee so coming for leave to disclaim under terms. Where the lease vests in him as trustee, he becomes personally liable for the rent, with a right to go against the bankrupt's estate for indemnity. When he has disclaimed the lease, then it has been held that the landlord's rights under the lease as against the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt are gone, and that he cannot sue the trustee for the use and occupation of the property. It has been held that the trustee cannot be sued as a trespasser, and under special circumstances it is, in my opinion, right that he should be put under the terms of making some payment to the landlord when he comes to ask for leave to deprive the landlord, as from the date of the adjudication, of the legal rights given to him by the lease, which is to be disclaimed or put an end to as from that date, the landlord having, except under r. 28, and by means of the right to prove given to him by s. 23, no remedy in respect of the trustee's use and occupation of the property, nor any right to treat the trustee as a trespasser.

E I think it is not necessary that we should in any way narrow the circumstances under which the court may impose terms on the trustee beyond saying that there must be special circumstances. The Master of the Rolls has already said he does not intend to restrict the power to cases like Ex parte Ladbury (2), in which terms were properly imposed, because the trustee had made a profit by the property. In any case, what the trustee will have to pay is not the profit which he has made, or the rent according to the lease, but, in determining what he ought to pay, regard must be had to two things, whether the occupation has either produced a benefit to the bankrupt's estate, or was contemplated as likely to produce a benefit, and to the circumstance that, in consequence of the disclaimer relating back to the date of the adjudication, the owner of the estate is in the interval between the adjudication and the execution of the disclaimer in the position that he has been lawfully kept out of the use of his property by virtue of the operation of the lease, and cannot after the disclaimer bring any action against the person who without his consent has been in the occupation of the property.

G These things ought to be taken into consideration. But taking the present case H simply as one of landlord and tenant, I cannot see that any special case has been made out by the building society to show that the sums which have been allowed them for the rent reserved under the attornment clause are not amply sufficient, even if the property were treated as theirs from the date of the adjudication, to compensate them for their property having been in the occupation of persons against whom they can make no claim, except under the power given to the court by r. 28. I There, in my opinion, is the entire foundation for imposing any terms on the trustee, or for the landlord's claim to have any payment made to him. I do not suggest that it was wrong to give the society what they have got. There was the agreement between the parties as to the mode of dealing with the distress, and certainly at present I do not see that this was done away with by the disclaimer. The whole ground of giving the landlord on such an application a right to receive something from the trustee in bankruptcy is that, from the effect of the disclaimer, he, the owner of the property, has been from the date of the adjudication in such a position that, though he has been kept out of his property, and it has been in the possession of another, he has no remedy at law or in equity for the purpose of A recovering compensation. But in the present case the position of the parties was, not that the building society were by the effect of the disclaimer as from the date of the adjudication the owners of property of which they were not in occupation, but that the trustees, as the owners of the equity of redemption, were in possession of their own property, and, therefore, it cannot be said that leave to disclaim ought not to be given, or that any terms should be imposed upon the trustees. The B ground on which terms are imposed are that since the date from which the disclaimer takes effect the possession has been contrary to the title. Here the possession has been in accordance with the title. I cannot see how the society, who have not been kept out of their property, because they might have taken possession when they pleased, can say that the court ought to give them, in addition to what has been already given, any compensation in order to justify the trustees in getting C that relief which they ask.

BOWEN, L.J.—I entertain a very clear opinion to the same effect, but I do not wish to add anything to what has been already said. It seems to me that the law could not be put more clearly than it has been by the Master of the Rolls and COTTON, L.J.

DAWKINS v. ANTROBUS AND OTHERS

[Reported 17 Ch.D. 615; 44 L.T. 557; 29 W.R. 511]

Club—Expulsion of member—Resolution of general meeting of members—Expulsion in accordance with rules and bona fide—Power of court to interfere.

The court has no right to sit as a court of appeal from the decision of the members of a club duly assembled and acting according to the rules, provided that in arriving at that decision the principles of natural justice were observed, e.g., where a member had been expelled from the club under a rule providing for the expulsion of a member guilty of conduct injurious to the character and interests of the club, that the member in question had been given proper notice of the meeting and an opportunity to attend it and be heard, and that the charges had been made against him, and the proceedings conducted, bona fide, fairly, and in the honest exercise of the powers given to the meeting by the rules of the club. These conditions having been fulfilled, the court had no right to consider whether or not what was done by the meeting was right or whether or not what was decided was reasonable.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Col. Dawkins, from a decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., dismissing an action brought by the plaintiff for a declaration that a resolution expelling him from a club, of which the defendants were also members, was invalid and of no effect, and for an injunction.

E The rules of a club provided that, in case the conduct of any member, either in or out of the club-house, should, in the opinion of the committee, or of any twenty members of the club who should certify the same in writing, be injurious to the character and interests of the club, the committee should be empowered (if they deemed it expedient) to recommend such member to resign, and, if the member so recommended should not comply within a month from the date of such communication being addressed to him, the committee should then call a general meeting of the members, and, if a majority of two-thirds of that meeting agreed by ballot to the expulsion of such member, his name should be erased from the list, and he should forfeit all right or claim upon the property of the club. The plaintiff, a member of the club, sent a pamphlet which reflected on the conduct of a Col. (now Lieut.-Gen.) Stephenson, also a member of the club, to the colonel at his official address, the pamphlet being enclosed in a cover on which was printed: "Dishonourable conduct of Col. Stephenson." This being brought to the attention of the committee, they called upon the plaintiff to resign, being of opinion that his conduct was injurious to the character and interests of the club. He not having resigned, a general meeting was duly called, at which the requisite majority voted in favour of his expulsion.

H Oswald and Sidney Phipson for the plaintiff.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Davey, Q.C., and Crossley, Q.C., for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

JAMES, L.J.—I think it may not be undesirable in dealing with this case, as general principles are involved in it, to refer to a decision of the Lords Commissioners of the year 1850, in Inderwick v. Snell (1). They were dealing, not with a club, but with a joint-stock company. The considerations which influenced them seem to me equally useful for the purpose of determining how courts of law should deal with institutions like this.

They say (2 Mac. & G. at p. 221):

"The 27th clause of the deed provides 'that an extraordinary general meeting, specially called for the purpose, may remove from his office any director or auditor for negligence, misconduct in office, or any other reasonable cause'."

The argument for the appellant rested on the allegation that the general cause of removal referred to in the clause being expressed to be reasonable, prevents the power referred to from being a power to remove at pleasure arbitrarily or capriciously, and made it requisite that the proceeding for exercising the power should be in its nature judicial, and that the reasonable cause should be such as a court of justice would consider good and sufficient. If this argument could be sustained, all proceedings at such meetings would be subject to the review of the courts of justice, which would have to inquire whether the cause of removal which was charged was, in their view, reasonable, whether the charges were bona fide brought forward, whether they were substantiated by such evidence as the nature of the case required, and whether the conclusion was come to upon a due consideration of the charge and evidence.

"But the deed is silent as to these matters, and the question is whether any such power of control in the courts of justice is to be inferred from the words 'reasonable cause' contained in the 27th clause; whether the expression 'reasonable cause' contained in such a deed of a trading partnership can be held to be such a cause as upon investigation in a court of justice must be held to be bona fide, founded on sufficient evidence, and just; or whether it ought not to be held to mean such cause as in the opinion of the shareholders duly assembled shall be deemed reasonable. We think the latter is the true construction and effect of the deed. In a moral point of view, no doubt, every charge of a cause of removal ought to be made bona fide, substantiated by sufficient evidence, and determined on a due consideration of the charge and evidence; and those who act on other principles may be guilty of a moral offence; they may be very unjust, and those who (being present at the meeting) are innocently misled by the statements made to them have no doubt a just right to complain that they have been led to concur in an unjust act. But the question is whether by this deed the shareholders duly assembled at a general meeting might not, or had not, a right to remove a director for a cause which they thought reasonable, without its being incumbent upon them to prove to this or any other court of justice that the charge was true and the decision just, or that the case was substantiated after a due consideration of the evidence and charge.

"We cannot take upon ourselves to say that, in the case of a trading partnership like this, this court has, upon such a clause in the deed of partnership, jurisdiction or authority to determine whether, by the unfounded speech of any supporter of the charge, the shareholders present may not have been misled or unduly influenced. All such meetings are liable to be misled by false or erroneous statements, and the amount of error or injustice thereby occasioned can rarely, if ever, be appreciated. This court might inquire whether the meeting was regularly held, and in case of fraud clearly proved might perhaps interfere with the acts done; but supposing the meeting to be regularly convened and held, the shareholders assembled at such meeting may exercise the powers given them by the deed. The effect of speeches and representations cannot be estimated, and for those who think themselves aggrieved by such representations, or think the conclusion unreasonable, it would seem that the only remedy is present defence by stating the truth and demanding time for investigation and proof, or the calling of another meeting, at which the whole matter may be re-considered. The plaintiff, objecting to this meeting, and considering it illegal, protested against it, but abstained from attending, and therefore made no answer or defence to, and required no proof of, the charges made against them. The adoption of this course was unfortunate, but does not afford any grounds for the interference of this court."

The commissioners went on to say that they believed the charges to be unfounded, but that they would not interfere.

A Reading "club" for "trading partnership," I apprehend that every word of that judgment is applicable to the present case. We have no right to sit as a court of appeal from the decision of the members of a club duly assembled. All we have to consider is whether the notice was or was not given according to the rules; whether the meeting was properly convened, and whether the meeting, if properly convened, has come to the conclusion that this gentleman ought to be expelled,

B having before it the fact that the committee had, upon investigation of the matter, come to the conclusion, and expressed the opinion, that his conduct was such as to entitle them to call upon him to resign. The object of calling the meeting was to sit in review upon the opinion of the committee, and the member, if he does not choose to resign, has a right, by the rules, to have the matter brought before the general meeting. The matter was brought before the general meeting,

C the committee having come to the conclusion upon the matters before them that his conduct was such as was likely to be injurious to the character and interests of the club. What they said was: "We think that sending an envelope, with a very offensive superscription, by one member of the club to another member of the club, is a character of misconduct likely to be injurious." Unless we can say that their conduct in holding that such conduct would be injurious to the character

D and interests of the club is so manifestly absurd and so manifestly idle that it can only have been a false pretence to cover something else, and, therefore, was fraudulently put forward for the purpose of giving effect to some preconceived notion of removing him without just cause, for which conclusion I can see no ground or foundation whatever (and I am far from thinking that the charge, based upon the envelope is idle), I say, with all deference—and I am going further

E than I ought, because the matter is not before us—I am satisfied I should have come to the same conclusion as the general meeting. I can conceive nothing more injurious to the character and interests of a club than the sending through the post by one member of a club an open envelope with those charges upon it. I do not say anything about the pamphlet, but the thing, to my mind, that reasonably led them upon such an insulting act to the conclusion at which they arrived

F was the sending the envelope by one member of the club to another, and it is not for me to say the committee were not well warranted in coming to the conclusion they did.

The next question to be decided is: Did they give the plaintiff notice? It appears to me they gave him ample notice. He does not deny that he sent the letter. The committee and the meeting gave him every opportunity of saying

G anything he chose to say to the committee or to the meeting, and he could have said: "Notwithstanding I did that, do you think it is a case for expulsion?" According to my view, he had the most ample opportunity of taking the opinion of the general assembly of the members duly convened, who were the real judges, supposing they did not act corruptly or fraudulently, of whether or not that rule ought to be applied. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Master of

H the Rolls ought to be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—I think we ought to take great care that this court does not, by successive decisions, usurp an authority in these cases for which it has no colour in point of law. In my opinion, there is some danger that the courts will undertake to act as courts of appeal against the decisions of members of clubs, whereas

I the court has no right or authority whatever to sit in appeal upon them at all. The only question which a court can properly consider is whether the members of the club, under such circumstances, have acted ultra vires or not, and it seems to me the only questions which a court can properly entertain for that purpose are whether anything has been done which is contrary to natural justice, although it is within the rules of a club—in other words, whether the rules of the club are contrary to natural justice; secondly, whether a person, who has not condoned the matter, has been acted against contrary to the rules of the club; and, thirdly, whether the decision of the club has been come to bona fide or not. Unless one of those charges can be made out by those who come before the court, the court has no power to interfere with what has been done. The court has no right, in my opinion, to consider whether what was done was right or not, or even, as a substantive question, whether what was decided was reasonable or not. The only question is whether it was done bona fide.

Is it true to say that an element, in considering whether a matter has been done in good faith, is to question whether what has been done is beyond all reason? That is evidence of want of good faith, but, even where that exists, it is not a necessary conclusion that there has been want of good faith, for, even after having come to the conclusion that a decision was wholly unreasonable, one might be convinced aliunde that, nevertheless, there was no malice—that what was done was done in good faith. The mere proof that it was contrary to reason is no cause or sufficient ground why the court should interfere. It is like the case of a malicious prosecution, where, if there is a want of reasonable and probable cause, that is evidence to go to the jury to support the other necessary allegation that there was malice in fact; but then the jury are told: “Even though I tell you there was a want of reasonable and probable cause, you must consider and decide for yourselves whether, besides that, there was not malice in fact.” In such cases, unless they find that there was also malice in fact, the propositions before them are not made out. So, in this case, even though I had been of opinion that the decision was wholly beyond reason, yet, considering the circumstances which are in evidence, and the persons against whom the charge is made, and the absolute absence of any evidence of indirect motive—even if I thought the decision were absolutely unreasonable—I should have declined to find that it was contrary to good faith, and should, therefore, have been of opinion that there was no ground for the interference of the court.

The first question then is whether there was anything contrary to natural justice? If a decision had been come to depriving a gentleman of his position on such a charge as must be made out here—namely, that he had been guilty of conduct injurious to the character and interests of the club—in my opinion, there would be a denial of natural justice, if such a decision had been arrived at without his having an opportunity of being heard. In my opinion, the charge made against the plaintiff, from beginning to end, was that he had sent an envelope through the public post to an officer in command of a regiment, on the outside of which envelope were the words, “Dishonourable conduct of Colonel Stephenson.” It is true that the fact of the pamphlet being inside was mentioned, and that would have been a charge in other cases, and a very fair charge in my opinion; but in this case that was not the material charge, the substance of the charge from beginning to end being the sending of the envelope. In the first letter he is informed: “We are told that you have sent an envelope; we want you to answer whether that is true or not.” The plaintiff does not answer, but says: “I request you to inform the committee that I decline to give any reply.” They do not take that as conclusive, but they enter upon the inquiry. They have a letter with his own handwriting before them; they do that which was lawful and legitimate; they compare the letter with the handwriting on the envelope to Col. Stephenson, and they say: “We come to the conclusion that it is your handwriting.” They do more. They send a letter to the plaintiff to say that they have come to a conclusion—prima facie, no doubt, and that, having done this, they wish to know whether the plaintiff will give any explanation. He says: “I deny your jurisdiction to ask me.” That is telling them he will not be a party to their inquiry. It is refusing to give any explanation. It is a direct refusal to go before them even. After that, it seems to me, he had ample opportunity of explaining that which was in terms told to him to be a charge against him. There was no want of natural justice. It was said that he had not ample opportunity of giving an explanation before the general meeting. I do not agree with that. It seems to me that before the general meeting as to the sending of that envelope he had an

A opportunity of giving an explanation if he chose. He was not shut out from it, and he declined to give any explanation whatever.

It was urged that this matter was not carried out according to the rules, and the first ground taken was that the rule was a void rule, because the rule had not been properly passed. I agree with the Master of the Rolls entirely in his reasoning that the rule was a properly passed rule. Then it was said that this was not done according to the rule because it was said the rule had been acted upon in a sense of being applied to matters which had occurred before it was passed. It was not so applied. It is quite true the rule ought not to be applied to matters which happened before the rule was passed. It was only applied to a matter which had happened after it was passed. It was said that there was malice in fact, and that the Master of the Rolls was wrong in holding that there was no malice in fact. That was put upon two grounds. It was suggested—it seems to me wantonly, improperly, and indefensibly—by insinuation, and not by direct attack, that the defendants allowed themselves to be actuated by subservience to higher authority, and that they came to a conclusion which they did not believe to be true, because they were authorities at the Horse Guards. All I can say is that there is not the slightest evidence to support such a suggestion. If such a suggestion had been made before me, where it would have been my duty to consider whether such question should have been asked of a jury, I should have said there is not a semblance of such evidence, and, therefore, those who have instructed counsel to make such a suggestion have done that which is contrary to every known sense of propriety.

Then it was said that there was a want of reason in the decision, and that the Master of the Rolls ought to have determined that there was malice in fact. It seems to me that raises this proposition: Can the court say that no reasonable men could have come to the decision? In my opinion, reasonable men could come to such a conclusion. Therefore, I see no grounds for saying that this is not a reasonable decision. I say further that if I had thought it an unreasonable decision I should have declined to come to the conclusion that there was any malice or want of good faith in those who arrived at it.

COTTON, L.J.—What we have to consider is what were the legal grounds considered by the committee, and ultimately by the general meeting? It is substantially the action of the general meeting that is impeached. The questions are whether the action of the committee and of the general meeting was authorised by any rule, that is to say, in form: Was it within the terms of the rule? Was it irregular? If those questions are answered in favour of the plaintiff, whether it has been made out to the court that the proceedings were bona fide in the honest exercise of the powers given by the rule, or malicious and fraudulent. We are not here to sit as a court of appeal from the decision of the committee or of the general meeting. We are not here to say whether we might have arrived at such a conclusion or not. Whether the decision was erroneous or not can only be taken into consideration on the question whether their opinion is so absurd, or evidently wrong, as to afford evidence that their action was not bona fide, but was malicious, or capricious, or proceeding from something other than a fair and honest exercise of the powers given by the rule.

I will consider shortly whether this rule is a valid and binding rule. Rule 13 of the original rules recognises the power to make any alteration in the standing rules of the club, but it has been urged that that does not justify such a rule as this, under which the action of the committee and the general meeting has been taken in expelling a member. But then we must consider, together with r. 13, r. 27 which provides: "No proposition affecting the general interests of the club shall be brought forward at a general meeting" unless there are certain things done. That shows, upon the construction of these rules, that rules affecting the general interests of the club might be passed, even although there was no such rule existing in the original rules, because it puts restrictions upon the mode in which these new rules are to be framed. In my opinion, therefore, having regard to r. 13, the club had power to pass this rule. Then it was said that r. 26 of the new rules was irregular, and not in accordance with natural justice. The first point was that that new rule was not retrospective. The real meaning of that objection was that r. 26 did not apply to those who were old members of the club. That, in other words, was raising the first objection over again, that the rule was only passed as to future members. If they chose to submit to a rule already passed providing that they should be liable to expulsion if they did certain things, I do not see how any question could be raised as to the validity of that rule, to which the new members voluntarily submitted themselves. When a new rule is added to the rules of a club it is intended to apply, not only to those who come in subsequently and submit to it, but also to those already in the club. When by the voice of the majority of the meeting it is said: "This shall in future be one of the rules of the club," it must equally apply, not only to future members, but to all members of the club, whether those members come in afterwards or not. In my opinion, that objection fails.

The other objection is as to the alleged irregularity or unfairness in carrying on these proceedings under this rule. It is said that the plaintiff was not summoned to appear before the committee. He was told the committee desired to know what explanation he had to give. He objected to the right of the committee to go into the charge, and to appear before them, and said: "I will not appear before you to justify what I have done." It is true the committee did say, and, in my opinion, rightly: "We do not go into the truth of the charges you made against Col. Stephenson. Irrespective of the truth of those charges, come before us, if you can, and justify that with which you are particularly charged, the sending to him, at his orderly room, a pamphlet with this envelope." This decided, and, in my opinion, rightly, that the question was not the truth of the charges made in the pamphlet, but whether the sending a pamphlet or envelope with this superscription to a fellow member of the club, to an officer in command of a regiment or a brigade, to the orderly room, was or was not a matter affecting injuriously the character and interests of the club. In my opinion, that objection cannot prevail.

Then it was said that there was no finding by the general meeting that the conduct of the plaintiff, which the committee, within the rule, found to be injurious, was injurious to the character and interests of the club. In form there was not, but we are dealing with matter of substance, and the substance of the finding of the general meeting was that, if the plaintiff did not retire, he ought to be expelled. That involved two things—first, that his conduct in this matter was injurious to the character and interests of the club, and, secondly, that being his offence, that the circumstances required he should be expelled. Of course, they could not expel him without finding that his conduct was injurious to the character and interests of the club. They might, under the circumstances, say: "Notwithstanding that is so, there are certain reasons, which we think it unnecessary to refer to, which entitle us to impose upon you the extreme penalty of expelling you from the club." When the matter came before the general meeting, it was an appeal to that meeting from the resolution arrived at by the committee, which they, the committee, had no power to enforce, and the general meeting could not help them to enforce it unless they were satisfied that the only ground upon which the committee had power to proceed was established to the satisfaction of the general meeting. Here I should refer to what was said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Labouchere v. Earl of Wharnccliffe (2) as to the resolution not having been put happily, or in a proper way. I must disclaim, on behalf of this court, the right to go into such matters as that, because what was done was in substance in accordance with the rule. If it was a fair and honest exercise of the power conferred by the rule, we have no right to interfere with the exercise of the power simply because something was not put in the formal way that might have been required upon demurrer. It might have been suggested that the question was:

A "Will you vote for the committee?" But here it was put: "Do you support, as right, the opinion of the committee or not?" In my opinion, that suggested ground fails.

The substantial question remains—namely, whether it has been made out that what was done was not within the rule, that it was not in the exercise of the power of the rule, and that it was done not bona fide or honestly, but maliciously, or so as to amount to a denial of natural justice. The only suggested denial of natural justice was the not summoning the plaintiff, or giving him an opportunity of being heard. But as regards this last question there is no evidence whatever. With the exception of certain matters, which I shall refer to presently, the only evidence in support of the grave allegation made against the committee and the members attending the general meeting was the affidavit of the plaintiff, that he believed certain motives had actuated one and the other. That is not evidence at all. If there had been no other facts to raise a prima facie case against them, they could not have been charged with what was stated by the plaintiff, simply because they did not come forward to meet that by evidence in denial.

I have heard only two facts which were said to raise the prima facie case. One was that there was a presumption that all the members of the club would support the committee, and the other was a charge made by the statement of claim in terms (which ought not, I think, to have been there) that, from the position of some of the members of the committee, it was to be presumed they acted unfairly and dishonestly. It is contended that there is a presumption which will prevent this being considered as a fair decision, that members of the club will support their committee, and that these rules cannot be acted upon. I cannot accede to the suggestion that members of a club, or any body of gentlemen, will support their committee (which they have elected) at the expense of truth and honesty. When they have a matter like this before them, I am satisfied that they will consider the matter fairly, and not arrive at a foregone conclusion at which the committee had previously arrived. There is the other matter. It is a charge of a gross character to suggest that any officers of the army should come to the conclusion at which they did because they held official relations with the persons in dispute with the plaintiff. That charge is utterly unwarrantable, and, in my opinion, raises no such presumption as that which the plaintiff seeks to draw from it.

There is, therefore, no evidence of anything to raise the probability that this conclusion of the committee and of the general meeting was arrived at unfairly and dishonestly; and the two facts which were relied upon in argument, in my opinion, do not raise the slightest tittle of a prima facie case against either the committee or the general meeting. In my opinion, there is no ground for asking the court to interfere with the decision arrived at by those bodies.

Appeal dismissed.

LONDON, BRIGHTON AND SOUTH COAST RAIL. CO. v. TRUMAN AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., the Earl of Selborne, Lord Blackburn and Lord FitzGerald), July 16, 17, 21, December 17, 1885]

Railway—Nuisance—Land purchased by agreement—Use for cattle yard.

A railway company were empowered by their special Act to carry cattle, and also (in addition to lands purchased compulsorily) to purchase by agreement, "any lands not exceeding in the whole fifty acres . . . in such places as shall be deemed eligible, for the purpose of making and providing additional stations, yards, wharfs, waiting, loading, and unloading places, warehouses, and other buildings and conveniences for receiving, depositing, loading, or keeping any cattle . . . conveyed or intended to be conveyed on the said railway, or for making convenient roads or ways thereto." They were also empowered to sell the additional lands and purchase other land which they should deem more eligible for their purposes. The company bought land by agreement near one of their stations, and used it for a dock or yard in connection with their cattle traffic. The occupiers of neighbouring houses brought an action in nuisance against the company for an injunction. It was admitted that there was no negligence on the part of the company in the conduct of the cattle traffic.

Held: the purpose for which the land had been acquired was expressly authorised by the Act as incidental and necessary to the authorised use of the railway for cattle traffic; the company were not bound to choose a site more convenient to other persons; accordingly, the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction.

C Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BAGGALLAY, BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 29 Ch.D. 89, affirming a decision of NORTH, J., reported 25 Ch.D. 423.

The respondents, Joseph Truman and others, brought an action against the appellant company, the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Co., for an injunction and damages for a nuisance caused by the use of a piece of land adjoining Croydon station, as a cattle dock or yard, for the purposes of the cattle traffic of the company. The company had purchased the land by auction under power given by s. 82 of the London and Brighton Railway Company Act, 1837.

Dec. 17, 1885. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the plaintiff, Joseph Truman, the occupier of a house in Lansdowne Road, Croydon, and certain other co-plaintiffs, occupiers of houses in the vicinity, complain of the defendants, that in the year 1881 the defendants erected certain cattle-pens, a cattle dock or yard, and have from that time to the bringing of the action used them for sheep, calves, and cattle, daily and nightly, for the purpose of their being loaded and unloaded, and have thereby caused great annoyance to the plaintiffs, and have substantially interfered with their comfort and enjoyment in the occupation of their houses. NORTH, J., before whom the action was tried, found that these allegations were established by the evidence, and the Court of Appeal was of opinion that that finding of fact was supported by the evidence. Neither the statement of claim nor any finding by the judge suggests that the defendants were guilty of any negligence in the use of the cattle-pens and dockyard, as distinguished from the selection of its site, and the whole question turns on the right of the railway company to select and use that site, although its use may involve a nuisance to the neighbouring proprietors.

H That question must depend upon the authority which Parliament has granted to the railway company. The ground upon which NORTH, J., has proceeded in that respect, supported by the Court of Appeal, although for different reasons, has been that, it being competent to the company to select another site more convenient and less injurious to the plaintiffs, they have selected a site which has caused the injury of which the plaintiffs complain. It cannot now be doubted that a railway company constituted for the purpose of carrying passengers, or goods or cattle, are protected in the use of the functions with which Parliament has entrusted them, if the use they make of those functions necessarily involves the creation of what would otherwise be a nuisance at common law. Ever since R. v. Pease (1), in 1832, it has been established so firmly by repeated decisions that that proposition is no longer within the region of controversy, and if these cattle-pens and dockyard had been within the original limits of deviation, or what was equivalent to the limits of deviation in modern Acts when the line was first authorised, and had been erected within those limits, I do not understand that any of the judges would have doubted that the company were acting within their powers, and were protected upon the principle I have stated above. For reasons which I will presently give, I think the same question which arises now might with equal plausibility have been urged in that case. A

But I pass on to consider the distinctions which are supposed to take this case out of the general principle to which reference has been made. The original Act was passed in 1837, and in 1881 the cattle-pens and dockyard were erected and used, I do not stay to inquire whether they were selected with a due regard to the public convenience. In the view I take that is an immaterial question, because I think, if the company were acting under their statutory authority, the absolute discretion of selecting the site was in them; if they were not, they would, like any other persons guilty of a nuisance, be liable to be restrained from a continuance of it. B
It seems to have been contemplated by the legislature when passing the Act of 1837 that it might become necessary, as time went on, to enable the company to provide additional stations and yards for receiving, loading, or keeping cattle, and for that purpose it enacted that, in addition to the lands authorised to be taken expressly, the company for such purposes might acquire other land, but restricted this power of purchase in several important particulars. The whole amount must not exceed 50 acres; it could only be taken by voluntary contract; and, as a matter of physical necessity, it could only be taken when it could be used in connection with, and as auxiliary to, the railway authorised by the Act. C D

I believe the whole question must turn on the effect to be given to s. 82 of the Act of 1837, which creates this flexible machinery for providing additional accommodation. It seems hardly to admit of argument that the statute intended such additional accommodation, when provided, to form part of and to be used with the railway, and, if so, to share the immunity which the railway, in its original construction, would have enjoyed from actions levelled at its use. It would be strange indeed if the legislature could be supposed to have authorised the railway to commit a nuisance up to a certain point, to have provided machinery for extending the railway and its use beyond that point, and yet to have allowed the further user to be open to an action to restrain its use. As I have said, the very same question which is now urged might with equal force have been urged against the original formation of the lines, and indeed was urged, though without effect, in R. v. Pease (1). The limits of deviation give to the company a discretion as to where they will fix their line, and in R. v. Pease (1) it was pointed out that the line might have been made within the limits of the company's powers so many yards from the highway as very much to diminish the nuisance to the traffic which, in that case, was the main subject of complaint. That argument, however, was disregarded, and in none of the cases, so far as I am aware, has it ever been revived, though in many cases, conspicuously in Hammersmith and City Rail. Co. v. Brand (3), it might have been very plausibly urged that a few feet further off would sensibly have diminished the vibration. But, in truth, it would be impossible to apply such a principle; the old notion of people losing their rights of complaint because they come to a nuisance has been long since exploded. Suppose the alternative site suggested in this place to have been taken. There may be at present no adjoining owners to Fairfield who would be disturbed in their occupation by the establishment of a cattle-dock there, but hereafter houses may be built, and, unless some new principle of law is to excuse the railway company from liability for the existence of the nuisance, I am at a loss to understand why the future neighbours of Fairfield will not have as good a right to restrain the company as the present occupiers of Lansdowne Road. It may not be immaterial to observe that s. 82 is equally applicable to passenger stations as to cattle-pens, and I can quite imagine that the establishment of a passenger station might be a real annoyance to a neighbour previously free from the noise involved in such an establishment. If the argument addressed to us is sound as to cattle-pens, it would be equally applicable to the creation of a new passenger station. E F G H I

A NORTH, J., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., expressly based their judgment upon the decision of your Lordships' House in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2), and it is a little singular to observe that the very phrases which some of your Lordships used in that case to distinguish the Acts of Parliament, which your Lordships were then construing, from the class of Acts now under review, are relied upon as justifying the proposition that the decision of that case must govern the present. I think it is enough, in discussing that case, to say that the ground of the decision was one which distinguished it from the present by reason of the very nature of the enactment which was then under discussion. The Railway Acts, treated as a well-known and recognised class of legislation, were expressly and carefully distinguished from the permissive character of the legislation which your Lordships were then construing. Broadly stated, the distinction taken amounted to this, that a smallpox hospital might be built and maintained if it could be done without creating a nuisance; whereas the Railway Acts were assumed to establish the proposition that the railway might be made and used whether a nuisance were created or not. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, the order of NORTH, J., discharged, the judgment entered for the defendants, and that the respondents should pay the costs both here and below.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—This was an action for an injunction and damages brought by the respondents against the appellants for a nuisance alleged to be caused to the respondents and their families by the appellants bringing cattle and other animals to their cattle dock, yard, and pens, situate on a certain piece of ground adjoining the Lansdowne Road, at Croydon (on the opposite side of which the respondents' houses are situate), and keeping such animals there, or in trucks on the adjoining rails. It is found, as the result of the facts in evidence, that there is a cause of action, unless the use made by the appellants of this land is authorised by their Acts; and also that there is no cause of action on the ground of negligence in the manner of doing what is authorised, if that use of the land is in fact authorised, so as to bring the case within the principle of R. v. Pease (1), Vaughan v. Taff Vale Rail. Co. (4), Hammersmith and City Rail. Co. v. Brand (3). The question, therefore, is whether it does or does not fall within that principle? The land, whether originally within the compulsory powers of the London and Brighton Railway Co. (whom the appellants represent) or not, was not acquired under those powers or during their continuance. It was considered in the courts below (and in this respect I see no reason to differ from them) to have been purchased by agreement under a power given by s. 82 of the London and Brighton Railway Act, 1837. The compulsory powers of the company expired in 1839, and this land was purchased at a sale by auction in 1851. If it could be made out (as was contended on the part of the respondents) that the powers of the company to purchase lands by agreement, whether under s. 82 or otherwise, were limited in point of duration to ten years by s. 124, or to seven years by s. 129 of the Act, it would, in my opinion, follow that, as there would be no statutory authority for the acquisition, so there could be none for the use of this land for any of the purposes of the railway. But I think it would be doing great violence to the language of those sections to put any such construction upon either of them. The purchase, therefore, was not unauthorised, though it could only be made (as it was made) by agreement.

What, then, were the purposes for which, by s. 82, the company was empowered to purchase, "in such places as should be deemed eligible," lands not exceeding in the whole fifty acres—in addition to those otherwise authorised? The company had express power under s. 198 to convey upon their railway in carriages propelled by locomotive engines or otherwise (inter alia), "all such cattle and other animals as should be offered to them for that purpose"; and the purposes expressed in s. 82 were,

"making and providing additional stations, yards, wharfs, waiting, loading, and unloading places, warehouses, buildings, and conveniences for receiving, depositing, loading, or keeping any cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things, conveyed or intended to be conveyed upon the railway."

The purpose, therefore, for which the land now in question is used by the company is one expressly authorised by the section under which it was acquired; and it is a purpose incidental and necessary to the authorised use of the railway itself for the general cattle traffic of the undertaking. If the authority is not such as to bring that use within the principle on which R. v. Pease (1) and the other cases to which I have referred were decided, I do not see how it could have been different if the complaint had been of a nuisance by the noise of locomotive engines or trains passing over the same land, which might have frightened horses and caused accidents in the Lansdowne Road. I understood counsel for the respondents to admit, as a necessary result of the principle of his argument, that this also would have been an actionable nuisance, and not within the ruling of R. v. Pease (1). That argument depended upon a distinction between lands taken under compulsory powers, and those taken under a merely enabling power, when the particular lands to be purchased were not absolutely, or within certain limits, defined.

It was not disputed that, if this land could have been, and had actually been, taken under the compulsory powers of the Act of 1837, or by agreement while those compulsory powers were existing and applicable to it, its use for the purposes complained of by the respondents would have been under statutory authority, and therefore not actionable. But the application of the same rule is denied as to land purchased by agreement under s. 82. Why so? It would seem, at first sight, that when land has been actually acquired under parliamentary authority by a railway company, and is used for the purpose, or for one of the purposes for which the power so to acquire it is expressly given, that use is as completely authorised and in exactly the same way (the purpose being incidental to the general traffic of the company on their line) as if it had been acquired under any compulsory power. And although no exact site or local limits may be prescribed by the terms of the authority for the acquisition of that land, yet, being directly subsidiary to the general traffic of the line, it follows from the very nature of the purposes authorised that it must be land contiguous to the railway or some of its stations, the local situation of the whole line of railway being within certain limits of deviation defined by the Act. The land to be purchased for these purposes may be "in such places as shall be" (i.e., by the company) "deemed eligible," but these can only be places (in the case of cattle and other animals) suitable in point of position for "receiving, depositing, loading, or keeping cattle, etc., conveyed or intended to be conveyed upon the railway." When acquired it must become part of the railway and its appurtenances in exactly the same way as if similar loading and unloading places had been made upon lands taken when the railway was first made, whether by compulsion or by agreement. It would be (as it seems to me) inconsistent and unreasonable to suppose that the legislature intended land so acquired for such purposes to be separated as to the legal conditions of its tenure and use for those purposes from the rest of the undertaking with which it would have become incorporated, and as to which the rule that what is authorised is not actionable is acknowledged to prevail.

It was urged that the company, having an option as to place, were bound to exercise it so that no adjoining landowner (or I suppose any other person) should suffer detriment from the subsequent use of the land for the authorised purposes. If it were the duty of the company in deciding upon the eligibility of the place to be governed by such considerations, they might be placed in very great difficulty. For even if any place could be found where no person would be liable to suffer detriment from the establishment of loading and unloading places for cattle near his land, it is obvious that the other considerations relative to the convenience of the company's traffic which the legislature must primarily have had in view, might

A have to be disregarded. The natural (and to the company and the public the most convenient) places for receiving and discharging cattle traffic to and from a railway must be in connection with or in proximity to stations at or near market towns or other populous places; certainly not in fields remote from any human habitations. But even if the company were to establish a cattle-station at a distance from any human habitation, it seems possible from Sturges v. Bridgman (5) that the law of nuisance might still pursue them there (unless protected from it on the principle of R. v. Pease (1)) in the event of an adjoining landowner afterwards thinking fit to build a house upon his own property. If it is the duty of a company, when they have any option, to select land (for the authorised purposes of their undertaking) so situated that its use for those purposes may not be detrimental, or may be as little detrimental as possible to any adjoining landowner, I am unable to see why it should make any difference whether all the land as to which they have so to exercise their choice is situated within prescribed limits, and subject to compulsory powers or not. In R. v. Pease (1) that argument was advanced (no doubt as to land within prescribed limits of deviation and under compulsory powers) without success.

I doubt much whether the order now under appeal would have been made if it had not been supposed in the courts below that the principle of Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2) was applicable to the case of all land purchased otherwise than under compulsory powers, or within prescribed and definite local limits. With that opinion I am unable to agree. In that case the establishment of a small-pox hospital within certain local limits was not specially authorised, as the construction of the London and Brighton Railway, for the purpose (among other things) of the loading, carriage, and unloading of cattle and other animals was here. If it had been I do not think that this House would have considered the case of any adjacent land in a situation not defined, which the board might have been authorised to purchase by agreement for the enlargement, as they might think desirable, of the hospital premises different from that of the site of the hospital itself. In that case no use of any land which must necessarily be a nuisance at common law was authorised; it was not shown to be impossible that lands might be acquired in such a situation and of such extent as to enable a smallpox hospital (if required by the poor law board) to be erected upon them without being a nuisance to adjoining land. Here there can be no question that the legislature has authorised acts to be done for the necessary and ordinary purposes of the railway traffic (e.g., such as those complained of in R. v. Pease (1)) which would be nuisances at common law, but which being so authorised are not actionable. In that case there were no compulsory powers; here there are the compulsory powers usually given to railway companies; and the land in question, though not acquired under those powers, was acquired for purposes expressly authorised, being ejusdem generis with those for which the compulsory powers were given, and was to be used in connection with and as subsidiary to the railway and other works executed under those powers. In that case there were no provisions for any compensation for any damages or injury to any persons under any circumstances. Here there are, the line being drawn, as is usual in Railway Acts, between lands taken or injuriously affected by the construction of the works (which are subjects of compensation) and lands which, or persons who, may suffer some subsequent detriment or annoyance from the authorised use of the railway and works when constructed, so that if the question had been one of compensation the respondents would not be within the line. In all these points, as it seems to me, the present case is not similar to, but is in direct contrast with Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2).

I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and the order of NORTH, J., discharged, and judgment in the action entered for the defendants, appellants here. No sufficient cause, that I can see, has been shown why the costs, both here and below, should not follow the event. Whatever has been paid by the appellants to the respondents under the order of NORTH, J., ought, of course, to be repaid.

LORD BLACKBURN.—This is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of NORTH, J., of Dec. 17, 1883, which was in favour of the plaintiffs below for damages for nuisance, and ordering that the defendant company be perpetually restrained

“from bringing cattle, calves, sheep, and other animals, to their cattle dock, yard, and pens, in the pleadings mentioned, and keeping such animals there, or in trucks on the adjoining rails, in such manner as to cause or be a nuisance and annoyance to the plaintiffs, or any of them.”

I take the following statement of the facts from the judgment of NORTH, J. :

“In the year 1851 the defendant company purchased a piece of land, between two and a half and three acres, lying to the west of their line between the station and Lansdowne Road. The purchase was doubtless made rather with a view to future requirements than for the present purposes of the company, as for many years the land so acquired, or a portion of it, was used as gardens for the servants of the company. The company are authorised by their Acts to be, and have from the first been, carriers of cattle. To give facilities for the receiving and loading and unloading thereof, certain structures called cattle banks, or cattle docks and pens, are found necessary, and in the early days of the railway these structures were erected on each side of the line very near to the general passenger station. These were found inconvenient, and about the year 1862 they were done away with, and a new cattle-bank was erected. In the year 1881 a new state of things arose. The town and neighbourhood of Croydon had increased enormously. It was the only place in the district where a cattle market was held, and the cattle trade had been very quickly and greatly developed. The accommodation at the old cattle-bank had become wholly insufficient. It was incapable of extension on that site; the site too had become dangerous by reason of the extension of the goods yard and sidings in its immediate neighbourhood, and the increased difficulty of getting cattle from the cattle-bank to the public road across the obstructions, and by the route used also for carriages and foot passengers. In addition to this, the requirements of the Privy Council with respect to the moving of cattle made further accommodation indispensable, and rendered a larger space for the purpose of this traffic imperatively necessary. To meet these requirements the company in the year 1881 devoted the piece of land I have mentioned to the purposes of their cattle traffic, and upon it they placed five or six new lines of railway sidings, and beyond this constructed what are called in the pleadings a cattle dock or yard, and cattle-pens, with an opening therefrom into Lansdowne Road, through which all the cattle traffic has been carried since these new arrangements were completed. I may add that this was all done by the company in consultation with, and with the full concurrence of, the local authority and the Privy Council. The plaintiffs allege that these new works by the company are a nuisance, and seek to have them restrained by injunction.”

I think no attempt was made to deny that this statement was accurate, and I read it at length because it has an important bearing on the question whether what I shall presently show is, in my opinion, the ratio decidendi of NORTH, J., can be supported. It is not disputed that the appellants have, since 1881, caused what would be an actionable nuisance entitling the respondents to an action, and an injunction against the appellants, unless the appellants could show statutable authority to use locomotive power to propel trains, and to carry cattle in those trains, and unload them on this land, without liability to an injunction against the proper exercise of those powers, though they might injuriously affect their neighbours.

The appellants relied on the Act of 1837, and more particularly ss. 82 and 129 of that Act, as giving them such powers. And, in my opinion, the principal question is, whether the true construction of that Act does or does not give such powers.

A I do not think there can be any doubt that, if on the true construction of a statute it appears to be the intention of the legislature that powers should be exercised, the proper exercise of which may occasion a nuisance to the owners of neighbouring land, and that this should be free from liability to an action for damages, or an injunction to prevent the continued proper exercise of those powers, effect must be given to the intention of the legislature. No doubt, when compensation is not
B given to those interested in the neighbouring land, this is as against them harsh legislation. But I think the construction of ordinary Railway Acts is now fixed. And whether they should have originally been construed so or not, I agree with what is said by NORTH, J. :

C “Now it is clearly settled that the power to take defined lands compulsorily, and to make a line of railway thereon and to use locomotives upon that line, entitled a company to run locomotives thereon, notwithstanding that in so doing they cause what in the absence of such power would be an actionable nuisance, provided always that they are not guilty of negligence: see R. v. Pease (1); Hammersmith and City Rail. Co. v. Brand (3). The same section which enables the company to use locomotives also gives them the power to convey cattle and other animals; and this power to carry must necessarily,
D without the assistance of s. 82, include the right to load and unload them; and it seems to me to follow that the company have the same right to load and unload, and to carry and convey cattle, as they have to use locomotives, and that they are as free in the one case as in the other from liability to be sued for causing thereby annoyance to their neighbours, provided always that negligence is absent.”

E The Act of 1837 is such a Railway Act, but s. 82, it is said, is not subject to the same construction as the rest of the Act. I do not think that any one of the judges below expresses any doubt that, if the cattle dock, yard, and pens and rails had been laid down on the line within the limits within which there was originally power to take land compulsorily, it must (on the construction now to be put on F Railway Acts) be held to have been the intention of the legislature to authorise the use of them free from action or injunction for the proper use of their powers on the part of those neighbouring owners who suffered annoyance to such an extent as would, but for the statutory authority given to the company, have entitled those owners to an injunction. But this only extends to the proper use of those statutable powers. I do not think that, if the company failed either in the fulfilment of the
G common law duty of taking proper care in the management of the traffic, which is what is in common language called negligence, or neglected any duty that on the construction of the whole Act it appears was cast upon them, which in a more technical sense is also included in the word negligence, they are freed from an injunction. It was not contended by the counsel for the appellants that the dock-
H yard, pens, and rails, against the use of which the injunction was granted, had been erected under the general powers of the Act; they relied entirely on s. 82. Nor did they contend that s. 82 in any way freed them from liability to an injunction if they were guilty of negligence either in its more limited or in its more extended sense; they denied that any negligence in the popular sense was proved. NORTH, J., says expressly that, “the charges of negligence fail,” and no attempt was made, either in the Court of Appeal or at your Lordships’ Bar, to show that
I this finding of fact was wrong. The respondents, both in the court below and at your Lordships’ Bar, argued that the power given by s. 82 had expired before 1851, as well as the general powers. If this had been so there would have been an end of the question. But I agree with all the judges below, and I believe with the Lords who heard this argument, that this is not correct.

I think it is now convenient to inquire what the true construction of s. 82 is. I think it must be read along with the rest of the Act of 1837. It conferred a power on the original company and their successors, to whom their powers are transferred, to contract with any person “for the purchase of any lands not exceeding in the whole fifty acres, in addition to the lands authorised to be taken," and, as they may by s. 83 sell those lands and purchase others, this power may be exercised from time to time. The land is to be purchased in "such place as shall be deemed eligible," so that the choice of the locality is left to the company; there is no restriction as to where it may be, further than that the nature of things requires that it should be near enough to the line to be used for the purposes to which the company were to apply it. Those are enumerated:

"for the purpose of making and providing [inter alia] additional stations, yards, waiting, loading, and unloading places . . . and conveniences for receiving, depositing, and loading or keeping any cattle . . . conveyed, or intended to be conveyed upon the railway . . . which the said company shall judge requisite."

It seems to me impossible to read the statement which I have read without coming to the conclusion that the company did on very sufficient grounds bona fide judge it requisite that there should be further conveniences for carrying cattle, and bona fide think the spot eligible, and I think the true construction of s. 82 is that the legislature intended them to be judges of this. I cannot doubt (on the construction of the whole Act) that, if there is a sufficient indication in the body of the Act of 1837 of the intention of the legislature that locomotive power and cattle traffic might be carried on free from injunction, if properly carried on, or, as is said, without negligence, on land acquired under the general powers of the Act of 1837, there is also an indication of intention that they may be so carried free from injunction on land acquired for that purpose under s. 82. I entirely agree with the reasoning of the noble and learned Earl on this point, and I do not repeat it. It is, however, no doubt the fact that under s. 82 the company are not bound to purchase any land, nor to apply it to any of the purposes mentioned, until they "judge it requisite," and even when they do judge it requisite, they are not bound to apply any specific piece of land to those purposes, nor even a piece of land in any specific place; it is in such place as "shall be deemed eligible" by the company. FRY, L.J., seems to think that the continuing power of choice makes it wrong to put a construction on the Act of 1837 giving on the land acquired under s. 82 the same powers as I think it is not disputed were given by the body of the Act on the other lands. If that is the ground of his decision I am unable to agree with him.

Much reference was made below to the opinions delivered in this House in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2). BAGGALLAY, L.J., seems to think that principles were there laid down which made it impossible to put the construction on s. 82 which I think ought to be put on it. I do not think that NORTH, J., went quite so far, and I think that BOWEN, L.J., dissented from that view. He says:

"In construing Railway Acts I do not think that we should be entitled to lay down a hard and fast line between the way in which the companies may exercise their powers upon lands taken by compulsion and the way in which they may exercise them upon land taken by agreement. It seems to me that, in this very case, by s. 82 the intention of the legislature was as fully expressed that the company should carry out on the fifty acres of land to be purchased the objects for which such land was authorised to be purchased as that it should carry out its general objects on the lands which it was empowered to purchase compulsorily. It is true that the absence of all intention to interfere with private rights in an Act of Parliament does not put an end to all controversy upon the right to commit a nuisance, and in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2) there was not to be found in the Act any element of compulsion, or any indication of an intention to interfere with private rights. I do not, however, think that the absence of one particular indication of an intention to interfere with private rights, or the presence of any one indication of such an intention is necessarily decisive."

A I prefer to adopt this language as my own to attempting to express the same idea in other words.

NORTH, J., says :

B "The plaintiff's counsel endeavoured to show that there was another site called Fairfield, at least as, if not more, eligible; but, if the onus of proof of any such matter were on them, they failed to establish it. I have no doubt that the directors have selected the site which they in the bona fide exercise of their discretion considered most advantageous to their shareholders in the first place, and possibly also to the trade and public in the second."

C He quotes a passage in LORD WATSON's opinion in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2), and then says :

D "In the present case it is pleaded that the company were guilty of negligence in selecting a place for their cattle yard and pens which was not suitable for the purpose. The fact that a nuisance is proved to exist without any negligence in the mode of conducting the business there shows that the place is not suitable for the purpose. [In this I cannot agree.] To justify this it would, according to LORD WATSON's view, be necessary for the company to prove, in addition to an imperative direction to erect such yard and pens somewhere within defined limits, the impossibility of erecting them anywhere else within those limits without their being a nuisance to anyone. The onus of proving this would be on the defendants, and they have not proved it, nor even given any evidence upon the subject."

E I quite agree that, if the true construction of the Act of 1837, including s. 82, is to impose on the company an obligation to prove this, they have not proved it. But I cannot agree that any such obligation is imposed upon them. That would in effect deprive the directors of all discretion. I do not think that any principle having this effect was laid down by LORD WATSON or any other Lord in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (2). I understand the passage cited as giving LORD WATSON's reasons for construing the Act then before the House has not given any power to do any act interfering with the rights of others against their will, on the ground, as is said by BOWEN, L.J., in the passage I have cited, F "that there was not to be found in the Act any element of compulsion or any indication of an intention to interfere with private rights."

G I do not think that it is shown that there was any onus cast on the company to give any such evidence as is suggested. I think it is not consistent with their having any power at all given them by s. 82 and that a construction which imposed that duty would render the section nugatory.

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the order proposed by the noble and learned Earl, whose opinion I have seen, is right.

H LORD FITZGERALD concurred.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ.), November 3, 1885]

Shipping—Carriage of goods by sea—Cargo—Discharge—Time for discharging—Need to lighten ship before proceeding to port—Custom—Reasonableness.

By a charterparty it was agreed that the plaintiffs' steamship should proceed to Cronstadt, load a full cargo of grain, and proceed to London, or to a good and safe port in the Bristol Channel as ordered, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of tide, and always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight." "Eight running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed the merchants, if the ship be not sooner despatched, for loading and discharging the steamer, and ten days on demurrage if required over and above the laying days, at £25 per day." The steamer occupied six days at Cronstadt in loading a cargo of 4,325 quarters of wheat, and was ordered to Gloucester for discharge. She arrived at Sharpness Dock, in the Bristol Channel, on Nov. 13. Sharpness Dock was within the port of Gloucester, and about seventeen miles from the basin, which was within the city of Gloucester, where grain cargoes were usually discharged if the burthen of the ship would admit, access to the city basin being attained by a ship canal. The steamer was ready to commence her discharge on Nov. 13, but could not get nearer to Gloucester than Sharpness until part of her cargo was discharged. On Nov. 14 and 15 the defendants took delivery of 1,585 quarters at Sharpness, and then required the master to take the steamer through the canal to the basin to complete the discharge. The master proceeded under protest, and arrived in the basin on Nov. 17. On Nov. 18 the discharge was completed, and the vessel arrived back at Sharpness on Nov. 19. In an action for demurrage a custom of the port of Gloucester was proved that the customary place for discharging grain cargoes was at the basin within the city, that when vessels with grain cargoes destined for Gloucester were of too heavy a burthen to go up the canal they were lightened at Sharpness, and that during the discharge at Sharpness of so much of the cargo as was necessary to enable the vessel to proceed by the canal to the basin the lay days counted, but that the time occupied by going up the canal to the basin and by returning to Sharpness was not counted.

Held: the custom was reasonable and not inconsistent with the express terms of the charterparty as to "running days," and, therefore, the time occupied by the vessel in going from Sharpness to the basin and in returning ought to be excluded from the lay days; accordingly the plaintiffs were entitled to one day's demurrage only.

B Appeal from a decision of POLLOCK, B., in an action tried by him with a special jury.

C The plaintiffs, owners of the steamship St. Hilda, claimed against the defendants, consignees of a grain cargo carried from Cronstadt to the port of Gloucester, a balance for freight and demurrage. The question between the parties was as to the number of lay days which were to be allowed to the defendants for discharging at the port of Gloucester. The plaintiffs claimed four days demurrage beyond the lay days, while the defendants admitted only one day, in respect of which they tendered before action, and paid into court the amount claimed for that day. The St. Hilda, a vessel of 495 tons net register, was by a charterparty made in London on Oct. 7, 1882, chartered by the plaintiffs to Messrs. Scaramanga & Co., a firm of London merchants. The charterparty provided that the steamer should proceed to Cronstadt, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and there load, always afloat, a full cargo of wheat or other grain, and therewith proceed to London, or to a good and safe port on the east coast of England, the English or Bristol Channel, or to certain other ports,

E "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of tide and always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight."

F "The freight to be paid on loading and right delivery of the cargo in cash; eight running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed the said merchants, if the ship be not sooner despatched for loading and discharging the said steamer, and ten days on demurrage if required over and above the said laying days, at £25 sterling per day."

G The St. Hilda proceeded to Cronstadt, and there loaded a cargo of 4,325 quarters of wheat in bulk. A bill of lading, signed by the master and delivered to Scaramanga & Co., provided for the delivery of the cargo to them or their assigns "on paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charterparty." There was endorsed on the charterparty, "six running days, Sundays excepted, expended in loading the cargo"; and further, "Capt. Robinson is hereby directed to proceed with steamship St. Hilda and her present cargo to Gloucester, Bristol Channel, for discharge." The steamer arrived at Sharpness Dock in the Bristol Channel, at 11 o'clock a.m. on Nov. 13, 1882. Sharpness Dock was within the port of Gloucester, and about seventeen miles from the basin, which was within the city of Gloucester, where grain cargoes were usually discharged if the burthen of the ship would admit, access from Sharpness Dock to the city basin being attained by the Berkeley ship canal. On Nov. 13, 1882, the steamer was cleared at the Custom House, and lay at Sharpness ready to commence the discharge and delivery of the cargo to the defendants, who were the holders of the bill of lading, but she could not get nearer to Gloucester than Sharpness unless a considerable portion of her cargo was first discharged at Sharpness. On Nov. 14 and 15 the defendants discharged and took delivery into lighters of 1,585 quarters, and then required the master to take the steamer through the canal to a discharging berth within the basin at Gloucester, and adjoining the defendants' warehouse. On Nov. 16 the captain proceeded under protest for the basin, and arrived on Nov. 17. On Nov. 18 the residue of the cargo, 2,740 quarters, was discharged by the defendants, and on the same day she commenced her return to Sharpness, where she arrived on the afternoon of Nov. 19. The plaintiffs claimed to reckon six days for detention at the port of discharge, making two lay days and four on demurrage, and for this they claimed to be allowed not only for the two days occupied in unloading at Sharpness and the one day unloading at Gloucester basin, but also for the two days occupied in proceeding from Sharpness to the basin, and the one day occupied in returning. The defendants contended that the two days occupied in going from Sharpness to the basin and the one day occupied in returning ought to be excluded, and they allowed only for the two days occupied in discharging at Sharpness and the one day at Gloucester basin, which, with the six days occupied by the loading at Cronstadt, would leave only one day on demurrage, for which they had paid the amount claimed into court.

At the trial before POLLOCK, B., and a special jury the above facts were admitted and no evidence was called on behalf of the plaintiffs. Two witnesses, corn merchants of long experience in Gloucester, were called on behalf of the defendants to prove the custom of the port of Gloucester with respect to the delivery of grain cargoes out of ships of too large a burthen to come up the canal without some portion of their cargo being discharged at the entrance. The custom as stated by them was as follows: That the customary place for discharging grain cargoes had always been at the basin within the city, and that they had never known a vessel refuse to go there; that when vessels with grain cargoes destined for Gloucester were of too heavy a burthen to come up the canal they were lightened at Sharpness; that during the discharge at Sharpness of so much of the cargo as it was necessary to discharge in order to enable the vessel to proceed by the canal to Gloucester basin the lay days counted, but that the time occupied by coming up the canal to discharge at Gloucester basin and by returning to Sharpness was not counted. They cited individual cases in which the question had arisen between a shipowner and the consignee, and in which after some dispute the shipowner had given way and accepted an amount of demurrage based on this custom. This evidence was not disputed by the plaintiff's counsel, and POLLOCK, B., found the custom proved. It was agreed that the jury should be discharged, and that the judge alone should deal with the case. POLLOCK, B., held the custom reasonable, and that it was not inconsistent with the terms of the charterparty, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled only to the one day's demurrage, which had been paid into court. He, therefore, gave a verdict and judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

H. Mathews, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question which arises is whether the shipowner in this case is entitled to charge the charterers or the consignees of the cargo—it matters not which—for two days during which the vessel was proceeding from Sharpness along the canal to the basin of the harbour within the city of Gloucester, and also for one day during which the vessel was returning between those places. By the terms of the charterparty, the vessel was to load in a foreign port, and, being loaded with a grain cargo, was to proceed at the choice of the charterer to a good and safe port on the east coast of England, to London, or to a port in the English Channel, or in the Bristol Channel. Until, therefore, the charterer had exercised his choice, and had ordered the vessel to her destination, it would not be known to what port she was to proceed. The vessel was ordered to Gloucester, which is undoubtedly a Bristol Channel port, being upon a navigable river which flows down to the Bristol Channel.

When in a charterparty, as in this one, a large choice of ports is given, to any one of which the vessel may be ordered to proceed, no one can tell the exact circumstances in which the vessel may be placed until it is known to what port she will be ordered; because the general rule governing the delivery of cargoes is that the vessel must proceed to the port to which she is ordered, and must there deliver at that port her cargo, according to the usual course of delivery at that port of such a cargo as she carries. The exact circumstances, therefore, in which the

A vessel may be placed will vary in various ports. Her owners cannot deliver her cargo at any place in the port as they may think fit, neither can the charterers order her to any place in the port to which they may think fit; her owners in this particular may not gratify their own whim and pleasure, nor are they bound by the whim and pleasure of the charterers, but they are bound and entitled to deliver the cargo at the port in one part of the port—namely, at that place in the port where such cargoes are usually delivered. That being the general rule, I have no doubt that, if it were shown that at a particular port the usual mode of unloading a particular cargo was to unload one-half or any proportion at one place in the port, and to unload the remainder at another place in the port, then the usual place of delivery of that cargo in that port would be at both those places. The shipowner would be bound and entitled to deliver the cargo in that way, unless some other stipulation had been made between him and the charterer as to the mode of unloading the ship.

I come to the clause as to lay days, which is a very common clause in charterparties—a clause as common as charterparties themselves. Some stipulation has to be made about the time to be occupied in loading and unloading the cargo; that time is fixed either expressly or impliedly—it may be fixed expressly by the parties, or fixed impliedly as a reasonable time by law. If it is fixed by the parties, they do it in this way: they allow a certain number of days during which the vessel is to be at the disposal of the charterers to load and unload her, and during which he is not to be called on to pay for the use of the ship; those days are the lay days. A lay days clause, therefore, is always a stipulation in the charterparty in favour of the charterer. Upon that stipulation a further stipulation is commonly engrafted dealing with demurrage days. Those are days beyond the lay days, during which the charterparty provides that the charterer shall pay a fixed sum for the use of the ship, if he keeps her doing nothing for the purpose of loading or unloading her for a certain number of days after the lay days are over. That stipulation is also in favour of the charterer, because instead of being involved in any dispute about the amount he has to pay for keeping the vessel idle, the sum to be paid per day during the demurrage days is fixed by the charterparty. If the charterer keeps the vessel idle beyond the demurrage days, the amount to be paid is a question of damages, and he does not know what he will have to pay until the amount has been settled by a tribunal or by agreement. In this case we have to deal with lay days.

Lay days are described in charterparties in various different ways, and may be stipulated for and calculated in various different manners. They may be, and sometimes are, described as days of so many working hours; then the number of days is fixed, and the number of hours per day during which the work is to proceed is also fixed. They may be described as so many "working days." In that case they will depend in some degree upon the port in which the vessel may be at her loading and discharge. "Working days" are not the same in every port in England even, and "working days" in foreign ports differ from working days in English ports. By custom, if not by law, English working days do not include Sundays, and in some foreign ports working days may include Sundays. Again, in some foreign ports, working days may not include saints' days, while such days would be working days in England. If by the custom of any particular port certain days in the year are holidays, so that by the custom no work is done in that port on those days, then the term "working days" in the charterparty does not at that port include those days. In an English port "working days" do not include Sundays and Christmas Days and some other days well known as holidays. "Working days," then, in a charterparty means days on which, at the port according to the custom of the port, work is done in loading and unloading ships, and in no case at an English port do they include Sundays. Merchants and shipowners have thought that there was something unsatisfactory in the use of the term "working days," and that lay days ought to be counted irrespective of the customs of different nations and different ports, and that the charterer must take the risk of whether or not work is done on Sundays and holidays at the various ports in which the chartered vessel may be. A

They have, therefore, introduced a new term into charterparties—namely, “running days.” That phrase is used to distinguish the days from working days. If “days” are spoken of in a charterparty, they are distinguished from “working days,” because, prima facie, “days” means all day and every day, and includes Sundays and holidays; but it is possible that disputes might arise about the meaning of the term “days” in such a connection, and it is to obviate any such difficulty that this term “running days” has been issued. That is a nautical term, and it can be at once seen what it means. What is the run of a ship? It is a phrase well known. One speaks of the number of days it will take a ship to “run” from the Indies to England, and “running days” are those days on which a ship is running. What are those? Why, all day and every day, day and night. That is as plain as possible the meaning of the term. “Running days” are those days during which, if the vessel were at sea, she would be running on her voyage—that is, every day and all day. In Brown v. Johnson (1) LORD ABINGER pointed out that, in point of truth, “days” and “running days” mean the same thing; because, if so many days for loading and unloading a vessel are spoken of in a charterparty, they include not only working days, but every day, including Sundays and holidays, and consequently it comes to pass that “days” and “running days” really mean the same thing. B C D

Having come to that conclusion, it now remains to consider in what manner the lay days—not “running days”—are to be calculated. They must begin as soon as the ship is at her berth in the usual place of delivery, and must go on from then consecutively. They must go on consecutively, not because the charterparty in terms says so, but because it is to be taken as a necessary implication that the parties intend that, as soon as the vessel begins to unload, the unloading is to proceed uninterruptedly upon consecutive days, neither party at his option taking a holiday. If the phrase “working days” is used, that consecutiveness is spoilt, for the reasons which I have already explained. “Running days” means, as I have said, the same thing as days, and, when the lay days are provided for as “running days,” the work must go on from day to day, every day being counted. A charterparty might provide that the lay days should be so many “running days” except Sundays, in which case the meaning would be that every day was to be counted except Sundays, those days being taken out by the express exception contained in the charterparty. E F

Now comes the question, Is the term “running days” in a charterparty contradicted by proof of a custom existing at a particular port that at that port certain intermediate days—such as Sundays, for instance—are to be taken out? It does not seem to me that there is any contradiction. It is only an explanation of how at that port the “running days” are to be calculated; they are not to be, as they ordinarily would be, consecutive, if the custom is to the contrary. I cannot see that such a custom contradicts any express or implied stipulation in the charterparty, and if it does not do so then the custom may be proved. In this case I think it cannot be denied that the custom was proved. The judge heard the evidence of two witnesses upon it, was satisfied with that evidence, and found that the custom was proved. That custom was, after all, a custom of a very limited kind, and was this: that when a vessel arrives at the port of Gloucester with a grain cargo (the custom does not apply to all cargoes), and is so heavily laden that she cannot go up the canal from Sharpness to the basin of Gloucester within the city, the shipowner has the right to call upon the charterer to be present at Sharpness to take delivery, not of all the cargo, but of so much thereof as will so lighten the vessel that she shall be able to pass up the canal to Gloucester basin; the time occupied in unloading thus much of the cargo at Sharpness counting as part of the lay days. The vessel then passes up the canal and delivers the remainder of her cargo in the basin and returns to Sharpness, the time occupied in going and returning not being counted as part of the lay days. I think the G H I

A custom assumes that Sharpness is within the port of Gloucester, because, if that were not so, by what right would the shipowner include the time occupied in unloading at Sharpness in the lay days? And for all the purposes of this case I treat Sharpness as being within the port of Gloucester.

What does the custom come to? It only comes to this: that at the port of Gloucester there are two usual places of discharge for grain cargo—the one at Sharpness where the ship discharges enough to enable her to pass up the canal; and the other at the basin at Gloucester, where the discharge is completed. If there was no custom, the lay days would of course begin at the beginning of the delivery at Sharpness, and would, if “days” or “running days” were provided for, go on consecutively from day to day. But the custom adds this term: that for the time occupied by the traversing of the canal—which is, be it remembered, a removal of the vessel within the limits of the port—lay days are not to be counted, and that out of the “running days” such an intermediate time is to be deducted. I cannot see that such a custom contradicts anything contained in the charterparty, and, so far from being an unreasonable custom, it seems to me to be a most reasonable one, and one calculated to do accurate justice between shipowner and charterer, having regard to the circumstances of the port. I think, therefore, that the judgment of POLLOCK, B., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed. I think the judgment of LORD ABINGER in Brown v. Johnson (1) is an express authority that such a custom as this is admissible, and that, if proved to exist in fact, it modifies the charterparty.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A custom was found by the judge to have been proved to this effect: that when vessels with grain cargoes come to discharge at the port of Gloucester, but are too heavily laden to go up the canal, they discharge at Sharpness so much of their cargo as is necessary to lighten them to enable them to go up the canal; that the days occupied in this discharge are counted among the lay days provided for by the charterparty, but that the lay days are interrupted while the vessel is going up the canal, and begin again when she arrives at the usual place of discharge in the basin of Gloucester. That was the custom found by the judge, and, although the evidence of the witnesses who proved the custom has been criticised, I see nothing which would justify us in saying that the judge was wrong in finding the custom to be that which he has stated. That seems to me a reasonable custom, and a custom which takes into account the interests both of the shipowner and of the charterer, and provides reasonably for each of those interests.

The main point argued was that this custom is inconsistent with the express terms of the charterparty, and of course that objection, if it could be made out, would be fatal. A custom when proved only modifies that which, in the absence of any custom, would be the consequence of the contract between the parties. It modifies their legal rights under the instrument, there being no express provision in the instrument with reference to the matter; but where the instrument itself deals with the subject-matter of the custom in a way contrary to the custom, then the rights of the parties are determined by the instrument. It is said that this charterparty provides eight running days for loading and unloading the cargo, that running days mean consecutive days, and that, therefore, the custom which breaks into the consecutive days is inconsistent with the express provisions of the charterparty. I think the fallacy of that argument is this: that “running days” means consecutive days. It may be true that, in the absence of any custom, running days would be consecutive days, but that is not conclusive. What we have to consider is whether the phrase “running days” is an express stipulation that the days shall be consecutive. I think it is not. I think the phrase “eight running days” will not, in the ordinary use of the English language, bear that meaning: “eight days running” might have done so, but I think “eight running days” has a different meaning. It may be that the consequence of using the term “running days” will, in the absence of custom, be that the days will be consecutive; but nothing has been quoted to show us that "running days" must necessarily mean "consecutive" days. A

I think the language used by LORD ABINGER in Brown v. Johnson (1) is quite contrary to the plaintiffs' contention. He says:

"With respect to the days, I think the word 'days' and 'running days' mean the same thing—namely, consecutive days—unless there be some particular custom." B

But he cannot mean that it is the same as if "consecutive days" had been expressly stipulated for, because, if "running" was the same as "consecutive," no custom could interfere to make the days not consecutive.

I think, therefore, that there is nothing in the express terms of this contract to prevent the custom from being introduced and proved, and, as it was introduced and proved, in my opinion the judgment of the learned judge was quite right. I am of opinion that the days spent in going up the canal and returning are not to be included in counting the lay days allowed for the discharge of the cargo. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed. C

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, upon the evidence, the custom was proved. The main point argued was that, taking the custom as proved, it was inconsistent with the terms of this charterparty, and cannot affect the question now in dispute between these parties. To reduce the argument of the plaintiffs to the smallest possible compass, it is this: that "running days" in this charterparty means and ought to be read as "consecutive days." Let me say, in the first place, that if the word "consecutive" is substituted for the word "running," the clause becomes wholly insensible, because it would follow that the time spent in loading, unloading, and in calling for orders at Elsinore, is all to be spent upon consecutive days. That is wholly impossible, and, therefore, the one word cannot, at any rate, be substituted for the other. Then it is urged that "running days" have been held to mean consecutive days. How does the custom bear upon that proposition? The custom is that the time which is necessarily consumed in going up the canal from Sharpness to Gloucester and in returning is not treated as part of the time for unloading. During that time the cargo is certainly not physically being discharged, and the custom of the port says that that time is not to be reckoned as part of the time allowed for the discharge. By the charterparty a fixed number of days are allowed for loading and for discharge. Looked at in that way, it appears to me that the custom is in strict conformity with the terms of the charterparty, and in no way inconsistent with it. I need not say anything more about the authorities. I think it is plain that "running days" means all days and every day, whether they are working days at the particular port or not. I think, therefore, that the judgment of POLLOCK, B., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed. D E F G

JACOBS, MARCUS & CO. v. CRÉDIT LYONNAIS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., and Bowen, L.J.), November 9, 1883, February 23, 1884]

32 W.R. 761]

Conflict of Laws—Contract to be partly performed abroad—Incorporation of foreign law—Determination by construction of contract—Intention of parties—Subject-matter and circumstances of contract.

What is to be the law by which a contract or any part of it is to be governed or applied, and the extent to which foreign law is to be incorporated in it, must always be a matter of the construction of the contract as read by the light of the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances. Certain presumptions or rules in this respect have been laid down by judicial writers of different countries and accepted by the courts, based on common sense, business convenience, and the comity of nations, but these are only presumptions or prima facie rules which are capable of being displaced wherever the clear intention of the parties can be gathered from the document itself and from the nature of the transaction. The broad rule is that the law of the country where the contract is made presumably governs the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of it, unless the contrary appears to be the express intention of the parties. Even where a contract made in England is to be performed abroad the parties may still have desired that their liabilities and obligations shall be governed by English law; or it may be that they intended to incorporate the foreign law to regulate the method and manner of performance abroad without altering any of the incidents which attach to the contract according to English law.

By a contract made in London between the plaintiffs, esparto merchants trading in London, and the defendants, a banking company, also carrying on business in London, the defendants agreed to supply certain quantities of Algerian esparto from time to time to the plaintiffs in England, the esparto to be prepared in Algeria for transportation to England. Owing to military operations and other causes in Algeria, the defendants were prevented from performing the contract, and, in defence to an action by the plaintiffs for breach of the contract, they pleaded force majeure under the French CIVIL CODE, the law prevailing in Algeria.

Held: the mere fact that the contract was partly to be performed abroad did not put an end to the inference, based on the true construction of the contract, that it remained an English contract between English merchants and was to be construed according to English law, with all the incidents which English law attached to the non-performance of such a contract; accordingly, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Divisional Court (DENMAN and MANISTY, JJ.) in an action for damages for breach of a contract by which the defendants undertook to deliver to the plaintiffs a quantity of esparto to be shipped, as provided, from Algeria. The defendants admitted that they had not delivered more esparto than the quantity mentioned in the statement of claim, but they said that by the law which prevailed at the time of the making of the contract sued on, and which still prevailed in Algeria (being, the defendants contended, the country where the acts for the non-performance of which the action was brought were by the said contract contracted to be done), no damages were recoverable for the non-performance of the contract by reason of the matters hereinafter mentioned. Throughout Algeria the law of the French CIVIL CODE prevailed and was applicable to mercantile contracts such as those set forth in the statement of claim. By the CODE :

The obligor is condemned, if there is ground for it, to the payment of damages either for the non-performance of the obligation or for delay in its performance in all cases where he does not prove that such non-performance arises from an extraneous cause which cannot be imputed to him, provided that there is no bad faith on his part. 1148. There is no ground for any damages when, by means of a superior force (force majeure) or an accident, the obligor

A has been prevented from giving or doing that which he was bound to give or do, or has done that which he was not bound to do."

The defendants said that during the time when the contract sued on should have been performed there was an insurrection in Algeria, and military operations were going on, and commands were issued by persons in authority preventing the collection and transport of esparto. Some of the esparto intended for delivery to the plaintiffs was burnt, and the servants or agents employed in carrying on work towards fulfilling the contract sued on were in some cases killed, in other cases maltreated, driven away from their work, and prevented working. By the said matters so happening in Algeria, and by other matters arising out of the said insurrection, and all of which amounted to force majeure within the law of Algeria, the defendants were prevented from procuring for shipment to the plaintiffs, and from shipping to them, any more esparto than was in fact shipped to them, and the defendants were prevented from performing their contract with the plaintiffs any further than they did perform it. The plaintiffs demurred to these statements in the defence, on the ground that the contracts were governed by English law and not by the law of Algeria. The learned judges of the Queen's Bench Division, after hearing argument, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., and Channell for the defendants.

Sidney Woolf (with him Forbes, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23, 1884. BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The plaintiffs are esparto merchants carrying on business in the city of London, and the defendants are a banking firm also carrying on business in the city. By a contract made in London on Oct. 6, 1880, the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 20,000 tons of Algerian esparto, to be shipped from Algeria during the year, 1881, by monthly deliveries on board ships or steamers to be provided by the plaintiffs; payment to be made by cash on arrival of the ship or steamer at her port of destination. The defendants delivered a portion of the esparto under the contract, but failed to deliver the remainder, and this action was brought by the plaintiffs for its non-delivery.

The defendants in their statement of defence admitted the non-delivery complained of, but alleged that the insurrection in Algeria, and the military operations connected with it, had rendered the performance of the contract impossible, and that by the French CIVIL CODE, which prevails throughout Algeria, force majeure is an excuse for non-performance. The plaintiffs demurred to this defence, on the ground that the contracts were governed by English law and not by the law of Algeria, and further alleged that the defendants or their agents could have procured and shipped esparto from other parts of Algeria where force majeure did not exist. The defendants, to the latter allegation, rejoined that the insurrection and military operations rendered it impossible to transport such esparto as last mentioned to the place fixed in the contract for the approval by the plaintiffs of its quality before shipment, or to transport the same to the place fixed in the contract for shipment. To this rejoinder there was a further demurrer upon similar grounds. The Court of Queen's Bench having given judgment upon both demurrers for the plaintiffs, the case now comes before us upon appeal.

The question which we have in substance to consider is whether non-performance of this agreement by the defendants can be excused on the ground that military operations in Algeria and the Algerian insurrection had rendered its performance impossible, and that such an excuse would have been recognised by the French CIVIL CODE, which prevails in Algeria in conformity with the following section as translated from the French:

"There is no ground for any damages when by means of a superior force or an accident the obligor has been prevented from giving or doing that which he was bound to give or do, or has done that which he was not bound to do."

The first matter we have to determine is whether this contract is to be construed according to English law or according to French. To decide this point we must turn to the contract itself, for it is open in all cases for parties to make such agreement as they please as to incorporating the provisions of any foreign law with their contracts. What is to be the law by which a contract or any part of it is to be governed or applied must be always a matter of construction of the contract itself, as read by the light of the subject-matter and of the surrounding circumstances.

Certain presumptions or rules in this respect have been laid down by judicial writers of different countries and accepted by the courts, based upon common sense, upon business convenience, and upon the comity of nations, but these are only presumptions or prima facie rules that are capable of being displaced wherever the clear intention of the parties can be gathered from the document itself and from the nature of the transaction. The broad rule is that the law of a country where a contract is made presumably governs the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of it, unless the contrary appears to be the express intention of the parties. LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., says (1 Wm. Bl. at p. 258):

"The general rule, established ex comitate et jure gentium, is, that the place where the contract is made, and not where the action is brought, is to be considered in expounding and enforcing the contract. But this rule admits of an exception where the parties, at the time of making the contract, had a view to a different kingdom."

This principle was explained by the Exchequer Chamber, in Lloyd v. Guibert (3) as follows (L.R. 1 Q.B. at pp. 122, 123):

"It is generally agreed that the law of the place where the contract is made is prima facie that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted as the footing upon which they dealt, and that such law ought therefore to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention, as for instance, that the contract is to be entirely performed elsewhere, or that the subject matter is immovable property situate in another country and so forth; which latter—though sometimes treated as distinct rules—appear more properly to be classed as exceptions to the more general one, by reason of the circumstances indicating an intention to be bound by a law different from that of the place where the contract is made, which intention is inferred from the subject-matter and from the surrounding circumstances, so far as they are relevant to construe and determine the character of the contract."

It is obvious, however, that the subject-matter of each contract must be looked at as well as the residence of the contracting parties, or the place where the contract is made. The place of performance is necessarily in many cases the place where the obligations of the contract will have to be enforced, and hence, as well as for other reasons, has been introduced another canon of construction to the effect that the law of the place of fulfilment of a contract determines its obligations. But this maxim as well as the former must give way to any inference that can legitimately be drawn from the character of the contract and the nature of the transaction. In most cases, no doubt, where a contract has to be wholly performed abroad, the reasonable presumption may be that it is intended to be a foreign contract determined by foreign law; but this prima facie view is in its turn capable of being rebutted by the expressed or implied intention of the parties as deduced from other circumstances. Again, it may be that the contract is partly to be performed in one place and partly in another. In such a case the only certain guide is to be found in applying sound ideas of business convenience and sense to the language of the contract itself, with a view to discovering from it the true intention of the parties. Even in respect of any performance that is to take place abroad, the parties may still have desired that their liabilities and obligations shall be governed by English law; or it may be that they have intended to incorporate the foreign law

A to regulate the method and manner of performance abroad, without altering any of the incidents which attach to the contract according to English law.

Stereotyped rules laid down by judicial writers cannot, therefore, be accepted as infallible canons of interpretation in these days, when commercial transactions have altered in character and increased in complexity; and there can be no hard and fast rule by which to construe the multiform commercial agreements with which in modern times we have to deal. In the present case, the contract was made in B London between merchants carrying on their business in the city of London, and payment was to be made in London. Presumably, therefore, we should infer that this was an English contract, and intended to be governed by English law, but it still remains to be considered whether anything in the contract itself, or in the nature of its stipulation, displaces this prima facie presumption either wholly or in C part.

It cannot be contended that the parties have in express terms provided that any portion of this contract is to be construed or applied otherwise than according to English law; but it was suggested by the defendants that such an intention ought to be inferred from certain provisions as to the collection of the esparto in Algeria, and as to the shipment thence. The esparto was to be shipped by the Compagnie

D Franco-Algerienne or their agent from Arzew, or any other port with safe anchorage, by sailing ships or steamers during the year 1881. The quality of the esparto was to be finally approved by the plaintiffs' representatives at the works of the Compagnie Franco-Algerienne at Ain-el-Hadjar in Algeria before being baled, and no claim respecting quality was to be allowed after the delivery of the bales at Arzew. The necessary ships or steamers were to be supplied by the plaintiffs.

E otherwise the esparto was to be warehoused by the Compagnie Franco-Algerienne at the plaintiffs' peril and risk. Insurance was to be effected by the defendants for the invoice amount at selling price, and 2 per cent. over in the United Kingdom on the usual conditions; payment to be made by cash on arrival of the ship or steamer at the port of destination. Finally, the contract contained an arbitration clause, with a provision that it should be made a rule of the High Court of Judicature on the application of either of the contracting parties. F

There is absolutely nothing in any part of this contract, as it appears to us, which can amount to an indication that it is in any way, or in any part of it, to be treated as anything except an English contract, unless it be the mere fact that the esparto is to be collected in Algeria, approved at the works of a French company in Algeria before shipment, and to be delivered on board ships of the plaintiffs at an G Algerian port, after which it is to be sent at the plaintiffs' risk. To hold that on this ground only the ordinary presumption is to be displaced, and that the parties must have meant some law other than the English law to govern the construction of any portion of the contract as regards the liabilities of the contracting parties, would be to introduce a serious element of uncertainty into mercantile contracts.

The mere fact that a contract of this description, made in England between English resident houses, under which payment is to be made in England upon delivery of goods from up country in an Algerian port, is partly to be performed in Algeria, does not put an end to the inference that the contract remains an English contract between English merchants, to be construed according to English law, and with all the incidents which English law attaches to the non-performance of such contracts. H

I One of the incidents which the English law attaches to a contract is that (except in certain excepted cases, as that of common carriers and bailees, of which this is not one), a person who expressly contracts absolutely to do a thing not naturally impossible is not excused for non-performance because of being prevented by vis major. LORD ELLENBOROUGH says in Atkinson v. Ritchie (4) (10 East, at p. 533):

"The rule laid down in the case of Paradine v. Jane (5) has often been recognised in courts of law as a sound one, i.e., that when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract":

see also Spence v. Chodwick (6), Lloyd v. Guibert (3). If inevitable necessity occurring in this country would not excuse non-performance, why should non-performance be excused on account of inevitable necessity arising abroad? So to hold would be to alter the liability which English law attaches to contracts, and would, in the absence of an express or implied intention to that effect, be contrary to authority as well as principle: see Barker v. Hodgson (7); Sjoerds v. Luscombe (8). Counsel for the defendants, in his argument, admitted that he was driven to contend that the law of the place of fulfilment not merely governed the mode of performance of this particular contract, but governed also the obligations in respect of performance and the liabilities in respect of non-performance of it. It seems to us, however, that the true principles of construction to be applied do not admit of this interpretation of this contract.

To what extent foreign law is to be incorporated in any contract must be, as we have said, a question of construction of the contract itself read by the light of the surrounding circumstances. If a contract, made in England by English subjects or residents, and upon which payment is to be made in England, has to be performed in part abroad, it might not be unreasonable to assume that the mode in which any part of it has to be performed abroad was intended to be in accordance with the law of the foreign country, and to construe the contract as incorporating silently to that extent all provisions of a foreign law which would regulate the method of performance, and which were not inconsistent with the English contract. But it cannot be gathered from such a contract as the present that the parties desired to go further, and to discharge the defendants from performance wherever circumstances arose which would, according to foreign law, excuse them. The contract has absolutely provided that delivery of the esparto shall be duly made, not that the bargain as to such delivery need only be observed when the foreign law would insist upon such observance. The contract being an English contract, only such portions of the French CIVIL CODE can be applied to its provisions as to performance in Algeria as are not inconsistent with the express language of the contract as interpreted according to English law.

If the parties had wished to incorporate a provision of French law which, in the event of vis major, would operate to excuse the contracting parties for non-performance, and thus to vary the natural construction of the instrument according to English law, they should have done so in express terms. Read by English law the contract is not susceptible of such an interpretation, and there is nothing to show that in this respect the parties desired the contract to be governed by the French law. For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below was right, and must be affirmed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Attorney-General—Institution of proceedings—Enforcement of public rights—Illegal acts tending to the injury of the public—No evidence of actual injury.

C

The Attorney-General may properly take proceedings on behalf of the public, when acts tending to the injury of the public are being done without lawful authority, even though no evidence be produced of actual injury having been inflicted.

D

The defendant company were incorporated by private Act to construct a road, bridge and works therein specified. The time laid down by the Act for the completion of the works expired, and the company continued the work. It was proved that the company so acted as to interfere with a public right of way and a towing path and also drove piles into the river Severn in such a way as to impede navigation, but there was no proof that any actual public injury had been sustained. The Attorney-General, at the relation of two shareholders of the defendant company, and the two shareholders, commenced proceedings against the company. The company obtained a new Act which revived and extended the powers given to them by the previous Act. The plaintiffs obtained leave to discontinue so much of their claim as related to matters other than a claim to restrain the defendant company from executing works off their own land, and the statement of claim was amended. On the question of costs, which depended on the sufficiency of the justification for the original institution of the action.

Held: the Attorney-General was justified in starting the action even though no actual public injury had occurred, and the company was liable to pay the costs of the action other than those relating to the part of it which had been discontinued.

Action by the Attorney-General, at the relation of two shareholders in the defendant company, and by the two shareholders for an injunction to restrain the defendant company from proceeding with works after the time allowed for their completion by Act of Parliament had expired, and claiming costs.

By the Shrewsbury (Kingsland) Bridge Act, 1873, which became law on May 15, 1873, the defendant company was incorporated, and was authorised to construct a certain road, bridge, and works therein specified, with power for those purposes to purchase, take, hold, and dispose of certain lands and hereditaments. Certain powers of raising moneys were contained in the Act, and by s. 14 it was provided that all moneys raised under the Acts should be applied for the purposes of the Act only. By s. 20 it was provided that the powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of the Act should not be exercised after the expiration of three years from the passing of the Act; and by s. 21 it was provided that if the undertaking was not completed within five years from the passing of the Act, then, on the expiration of that period, the powers granted by the Act to the company for making and completing the same, or otherwise in relation thereto, should cease to be exercised, except as to so much thereof as was then completed. On May 15, 1878, the five years allowed for completion by the Act of Parliament had expired, but the road and bridge were not completed.

On Dec. 31, 1879, the present action was commenced by the Attorney-General (on the relation of Benjamin Brown and Charles John Harris), and the said B. Brown and C. J. Harris, against the company, Brown and Harris being shareholders in the company. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that, notwithstanding the expiration of the five years, the defendants were proceeding with their road, bridge, and works, and were interfering with roads and lanes for that purpose, and were expending the capital of the company in such construction, and had lately entered into contracts for the purpose of further proceeding with the undertaking, which would involve a large expenditure of capital, and were threatening and intending to interfere with public roads and ways, lands and hereditaments, in alleged pursuance of the Act, in the same manner as if they had Parliamentary powers, notwithstanding the cessation of those powers, and that they intended to expend money raised or to be raised under the Act for the purposes aforesaid, and other purposes not authorised by Parliament. The statement of claim also alleged that the defendants were spending and intending to spend moneys raised under the Act in applying for a new Act to revive their lapsed powers and grant new ones; that the defendants were largely in debt; and that, unless the defendants were restrained from proceeding with the acts aforesaid, the shareholders' moneys would be used by the defendants for illegal purposes, to the injury of the public and the personal injury of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the works originally authorised by the Act of 1873, and from interfering with any roads, lands, or hereditaments for the purpose, or alleged purpose, of the said works, or other purposes not authorised by Parliament, and from applying any of the moneys so raised or to be raised under the said Act for the purposes aforesaid, or for the preparation for, or otherwise in or about, such contemplated application to Parliament as aforesaid, or for any other purpose not authorised by Parliament; with further relief.

By their statement of defence the defendants denied that they had done unauthorised acts since May 15, 1878, and alleged that work done since that date with the sanction of the company had been done on land belonging to the company, and that work done since that date on land not belonging to the company had been done by the contractors without the authority of the company, and at their own risk. The defendants also denied the other statements contained in the

A statement of claim, and alleged that the plaintiffs Brown and Harris were interested in a rival scheme for a bridge over the Severn. They alleged that they had not, since the expiration of their powers, done any act which was ultra vires, and they had not done or threatened to do anything which had caused, or tended to cause, any mischief or injury to the public, or any damage peculiar to Brown and Harris, and they submitted and insisted that nothing had been done, or threatened to be done, by them which entitled Brown and Harris to any personal remedy in the action, or which entitled the Attorney-General to sue in the action for the purpose of protecting the interests of the public. On Jan. 30, 1880, the plaintiffs moved to restrain the acts complained of, and the defendants gave an undertaking not to do anything off their own land, and not to expend moneys of the company.

On July 9, 1880, the defendant company obtained the new Act, by which the powers of their former Act of 1873 were revived and extended, and on Mar. 17, 1881, the plaintiffs applied for and obtained leave to discontinue so much of their claim in the action as related to matters other than the claim to have the defendants restrained before the passing of the Act of 1880 from executing works off their own lands according to the terms of the defendants' undertaking, given on Jan. 30, 1880. The plaintiffs were ordered to pay the defendants' costs of the discontinued part of the action, and leave was given to amend the statement of claim. The statement of claim was accordingly amended so as to claim only an injunction in the terms of the undertaking so far as related to the execution of work off the defendants' own land before the Act of 1880, and the costs of the action other than those ordered to be paid by the plaintiffs by the order of Mar. 17, 1881. The action now came on for hearing, and the only real question at issue was as to the costs of the action, which depended on the sufficiency of the justification for its original institution.

Langworthy for the defendants.

FRY, J.—The facts of the case which I have now to decide are shortly these. The defendant company, after the expiration of the five years for which the powers given by their Act of Parliament were made to last, acted in such a way as to interfere with a public right of way and with a towing path, and also drove piles into the bed of the river Severn in such a manner as to be calculated to impede the navigation. The Attorney-General thereupon filed an information against the company at the relation of the co-plaintiffs, two of the shareholders in the company. It does not appear that there has been any interference with any private right, and the question, therefore, is whether the Attorney-General has or has not a right to interfere in such a case without showing some substantial injury to the public.

From the cases which have been cited it appears that there is some conflict of authority on the point, or, at least, a want of uniformity among the various opinions which have been expressed. But, before considering them, I will make this observation, that this is clearly a case in which I have to deal with a public body which thinks fit, without any power (for its powers had come to an end), to do acts which undoubtedly tend in their nature to interfere with the rights of the public, and so to injure the public. The question is whether the Attorney-General is justified in interfering, though there is no evidence of public injury, and in my judgment he is entitled and bound so to interfere, and the court is bound to attend to his interference.

One of the earliest cases on the subject which came before the courts was A.-G. v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Rail. Co. (1), in which the court, at the instance of the Attorney-General, restrained the opening of a railway not authorised by the Board of Trade. There LORD ROMILLY, M.R., stated the view he took of the case in these words (2 W.R. at p. 331), that

"undoubtedly the Attorney-General might apply to the court in cases of nuisances. It was properly said on the other side that, in all such cases, the court required that the nuisance should be proved. But he was also of opinion that the Attorney-General, as parens patriæ, might apply to the court to restrain the execution of an illegal act of a public nature, provided it was established that the act was an illegal act, and it affected the public generally."

Again, in A.-G. v. Cockermouth Local Board (2), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., refused to grant an injunction upon the bill, because he came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of nuisance caused by the defendants' acts, but he nevertheless granted an injunction to restrain the board from polluting the water of the river Derwent, because that was prohibited by the Act of Parliament. There, as in the present case, there was no evidence of actual injury, but there was evidence that the board was doing illegal acts tending in their nature to the injury of the public, and the injunction was granted on the information, with costs.

In the more recent case of A.-G. v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (3), however, the learned lords justices appear to have differed somewhat in their opinions. If they had expressed any decided view affecting this case, I need not say I should have followed it; but, having regard to the difference of opinion in that case, it seems to me that the case furnishes no very distinct guide. But when I examine the judgment of JAMES, L.J., whose opinion was most adverse to the rights of the Attorney-General, I think that, according to his view, the action in the present case can be maintained; for, referring to A.-G. v. Cockermouth Local Board (2) he says in explanation of it that the board was doing work which would, or might probably, poison a running stream, in direct violation of the law which prohibited the commission of a nuisance, and that that seemed to him to be a good illustration of the cases in which it was essential for the protection of the public and of individuals that the Attorney-General should interfere. But just as those acts, which were there restrained without proof of injury, were acts which tended to the injury of the public, so are the acts which in the present case the Attorney-General seeks to have restrained such as in their nature tend to the injury of the public. Therefore, in coming to the conclusion that the action can be maintained without evidence of actual injury to the public, I consider that I am acting in accordance with the views of the lords justices.

There is the further authority of LORD HATHERLEY, in A.-G. v. Ely, Haddenham and Sutton Rail. Co. (4) in which he said (4 Ch. App. at p. 199):

"The question is whether what has been done has been done in accordance with the observance of the law. If not, the Attorney-General strictly represents the whole of the public, in saying that the law shall be observed."

Here the law has been broken in a manner tending to the injury of the public, and in my judgment the relators are entitled to costs. The costs have not been increased by adding the relators as plaintiffs, and I shall allow the whole of the costs which are now in dispute.

Order accordingly.

B Sale of Land—Building scheme—Restrictive covenant—Covenant against use of premises as beershop.

Under an order of the court building land was sold by trustees in lots. One lot was sold for the purpose of erecting a public-house, and the trustees covenanted with the purchaser that they would take covenants from all the purchasers of other lots against the use of the buildings to be erected on their lots "as a public-house, tavern, or beershop." One of the other lots was subsequently sold to a gas company, who sold to the defendant A who let the house erected on his lot to his co-defendant B on a tenancy from year to year. B obtained a licence for the sale of beer to be consumed off the premises, and carried on trade under his licence. Restrictive covenants had been inserted in the conveyances to the gas company and to A. The plaintiff acquired the freehold in the public-house lot from the original purchaser.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the covenants contained in the conveyance to the gas company and to A, and injunctions lay against both defendants restraining them from using the premises as a beershop, with an inquiry as to damages.

Action for injunctions.

In 1863 property at West Ham was laid out as a building estate, under the direction of the Court of Chancery, by the trustees under the will of one Richard Hudson, in whom the property was then vested. By a deed of conveyance dated July 1, 1863, the trustees conveyed to Abel Collins one plot which had been reserved for a public-house, and (for the purpose of binding their assigns at all times, but each of them, so as to be personally binding only on himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators) covenanted with Collins, his heirs and assigns, that they would not thereafter sell or convey any portion of the property without requiring the purchaser to enter into a covenant with them not to erect thereon, or use or permit to be used, any building to be erected thereon as a tavern, public-house, or beershop. It was proved that Collins had stipulated for the insertion of this covenant, and that it formed part of the consideration for his purchasing the property. Collins built on the plot a public-house called the Princess Alexandra Tavern. In 1866 by indenture he demised the public-house to the plaintiff Nicoll, his son-in-law, for the term of 99 years, and the plaintiff subsequently acquired the reversion in fee. In 1869, by order of the court, other portions of the property at West Ham were put up for sale by auction in building lots; among the conditions of sale was one requiring the purchasers to covenant against the use of their respective lots for the purposes of a tavern, public-house, or beershop. The Gas Light and Coke Co. purchased certain lots, in the conveyance of which, on Dec. 31, 1870, the company entered into a covenant for themselves, their successors and assigns, that they would not at any time thereafter use or permit to be used any building erected on the piece of land and premises as a tavern, public-house, or beershop. The company erected a messuage on part of the land, and sold it to the defendant Prosser, who by the conveyance to him, entered into a covenant in terms similar to those contained in the conveyance to the company. In December, 1879, the defendant Prosser agreed to let the messuage in question to his co-defendant Fenning for one year certain, Fenning by the agreement covenanting not to carry on upon the premises without Prosser's licence any trade, business, or manufacture whatsoever, except the trade or business of a retailer of beer, not to be drunk on the premises, and of wines and spirits under the licence commonly known as a grocer's licence. Fenning obtained the necessary licence in January, 1880, and at once commenced to sell beer to be drunk off the premises. In April, 1881, the plaintiff brought an action to restrain the defendants, their servants and agents from using or permitting

A the message to be used as a public-house, tavern or beershop and for damages. By leave of the court the present trustees of Richard Hudson's will were added as co-plaintiffs. Evidence was adduced to prove that there had been a falling off in the plaintiff's takings since the opening of the defendant's house, in consequence of the trade carried on there.

C BACON, V.-C.—The time of the court has been spent in discussing a great number of cases which have the most remote bearing on the question at issue in the case before me. It is a plain principle of equity that covenants of this kind must be construed according to the intentions of the parties by and with whom they were entered into. In the present case there was a building estate divided into lots, and it was arranged that one of the lots should be set apart for a public-house, and that the purchasers of the other lots should enter into covenants against the use of their lots for public-houses. It was for the mutual benefit of all parties that all should be protected against the building of many public-houses on the estate, and all the parties have a right to enforce what was meant for the benefit of all.

D If I attended at all to the argument that has been addressed to me as to the want of mutuality in such a covenant as this, that would be a sufficient answer to it, that the covenant was equally for the benefit of the purchasers as of the vendors. Every person to whom the original purchasers afterwards sold was entitled to the benefit of that covenant; each one was to benefit by the covenant that only one public-house should be built upon the property. From the date of the contract entered into with the purchasers the vendors held the remainder of the property subject to that covenant, imposed by them, but for the benefit of all parties. From that time they could not rightly assign any portion of the land without inserting in the conveyance such a restrictive covenant. That being so, the gas company purchase a portion of the land subject to the covenant and enter into the covenant. F The defendant Prosser, in his turn, buys the land subject to the same covenant.

G In the old days, before the Common Law Procedure Acts, this case might have been argued ad infinitum at common law whether the covenant ran with the land, but in equity it could never have been doubted. The cases that have been cited before me are all entirely different from that with which I have to deal, except Mann v. Stephens (1), which is entirely in point. In Renals v. Cowlshaw (2) I find in the judgment the principle laid down that the intention of the parties is to be followed, and that is the principle which I apply in deciding this case. In Kemp v. Bird (3) the decision was different, but the very same principle is laid down in that case also. I think there has been sufficient evidence of damage to induce me to grant an inquiry as to the amount of that damage.

H Injunctions against both defendants and inquiry as to damages.

Bankruptcy—Set-off—Landlord and tenant—Farm—Bankruptcy of farmer—Trustee continuing tenancy—Customary claim for tillages by trustee at expiration of lease—Landlord's right to set off rent due from bankrupt at time of bankruptcy.

The trustee of a bankrupt lessee of a farm did not disclaim the lease, but carried on the farm for a year, when the lease terminated by due notice from the trustee to the landlord. The custom of the country required the landlord, at the expiration of the lease, to pay the tenant a valuation for tillages, sowing, and cultivation. In an action by the trustee for the recovery of this sum from the landlord,

Held: the landlord was not entitled to set off against the trustee's claim rent due from the bankrupt lessee at the time of his bankruptcy.

Special Case stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division by consent of the parties to determine whether the defendant was entitled to set off against the plaintiff's claim for tillages rent due to him from a bankrupt lessee of whom the plaintiff was trustee.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11, 1882. DENMAN, J.—In this case we took time to consider our judgment until this morning, and for myself I will at once candidly admit that, though after the argument yesterday I thought counsel for the defendant had made out no case, still I was under the apprehension that it might be owing to my not under-

A standing the argument addressed to us. Counsel for the defendant made a most ingenious argument, but upon the best judgment I can form, his contention was entirely unsupported by any authority.

B The Special Case states that in 1879 one Webb was tenant from year to year to the defendant of a farm. The terms of the tenancy were not expressly agreed upon, but the custom of the country required that Webb should till and cultivate the farm in a husbandlike manner, and that the landlord for the time being should, at the expiration of the tenancy, pay Webb, or the person who should at the expiration of the tenancy be tenant of the farm, all such reasonable allowances as the tenant should, according to the custom of the country, be entitled to receive from the landlord for any tillages, sowing, or cultivation of the tenant. Then it states that on Sept. 29, 1879, Webb instituted proceedings in bankruptcy for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and the plaintiff was appointed trustee, and, therefore, the tenancy of Webb became vested in the plaintiff, subject to the right of the plaintiff to disclaim the same, pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 23 [see now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 54 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 389)]. The plaintiff elected not to disclaim but to carry on the business of the debtor, and to remain tenant to the defendant, and the tenancy expired on Sept. 29, 1880, by the plaintiff having duly given notice to the defendant of his intention to deliver up possession of the farm upon that day. It then states that the plaintiff, according to the custom, was entitled to receive from the defendant reasonable allowances for tillages, sowing, and cultivation; that a valuer was appointed, and the amount fixed. There is another minor sum about which there is no dispute, and then it was stated that

E "the defendant admits [this] debt and admits that the valuation was properly made and is binding on him, but seeks to reduce his liability to the plaintiff in respect of the said matters by the set-off or counterclaim hereinafter appearing."

F We need not go into the details of that. It amounts to a statement that at the time of the liquidation there was due from Webb to the defendant £300 for two years' arrears of rent.

As to £150, being a year's rent due, the plaintiff says he always was willing and has frequently offered to set off such sum against his claim. At the end of the Case the question for our opinion is,

G "whether the defendant is, under the circumstances hereinbefore appearing, entitled to set off against the claim of the plaintiff the said rent, amounting to £450, or any part thereof."

H But it is agreed between the parties that the only question is as to £150 for a year's rent due before the bankruptcy; that is, whether it can be set off against the plaintiff's claim by reason of any statute or any equitable principle. I can find nothing in the statute relating to such a case, and counsel for the defendant has been driven to contend that, by an analogy to another case he has cited, Re Sneezum, Ex parte Davis (1), and according to the principles of that case, the defendant should be allowed to set off the rent due before the bankruptcy, and on the ground that the trustee was getting the benefit of the nonpayment of the rent by Webb, and that was a consideration for what he was to receive for tillage. I see nothing in Re Sneezum (1) which decides anything of the kind. I see no analogy between that case and this. That was not as to a right to set-off, but as to a right to prove against the bankrupt's estate. There may be here a right to prove, but I cannot see that that renders it analogous to Re Sneezum (1).

I But counsel for the defendant has not cited any case where the trustee carries on a farm, and, by reason of the custom of the country or otherwise, he is entitled to receive compensation for tillage, that in such a case the landlord has not only a right of proof, but a right to set off as against money actually expended by the trustee a sum for rent which was due at the time the trustee's interest first accrued. Then he says that the rent ought to have been paid, and but for that the trustee could not have earned what he now sues for; but there is no privity, no mutuality between the two things. The trustee for the benefit of the estate enters and carries on the farm, lays out money, and at the end of the term he is entitled to be reimbursed the sum he has laid out. I cannot see any such one contract, any such mutual dealings, to make one have any connection with the other. The case for the defendant is put upon two grounds, the first of which is based upon the statute. but I see no argument whatever on that ground. The second ground is, that the defendant is entitled to set it off on an equitable principle; but I think counsel for the defendant has failed to make out any right on the part of the defendant to set off the £150 for a year's rent due before the bankruptcy against the sum due to the trustee for tillage.

MANISTY, J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The facts are so short that I may be excused for repeating them. Webb was tenant from year to year; he became bankrupt on Sept. 29, 1879, and the plaintiff, Alloway, was appointed trustee.

The first question to be considered is: What was the position, rights, and liabilities of Alloway when he was appointed trustee? There were two courses open to him. He might have disclaimed, but omitting to do that the term became vested in him. At that time there was a breach of the agreement or of the conditions on which the farm was held by the tenant; and the landlord for that breach could no longer sue the tenant because of the bankruptcy. He could prove against the estate and distrain. There were two years' rent due, and he did distrain, and it is assumed between the parties that he must be taken to have distrained for one year's rent. But what was the relative position of the trustee in bankruptcy and the landlord? Counsel for the defendant candidly admitted that he felt the plaintiff was personally liable for the performance of the covenants, and he spoke as if it was a formidable difficulty in his way, and I think it was. In Titterton v. Cooper (2) the whole matter was gone into, and the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal was, that the trustee not disclaiming is in the position of an ordinary assignee. I cannot do better than read a few lines in the judgment of COTTON, L.J.:

"He is liable not by reason of any express provision in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but because the statute makes him an assignee, and the same liability attaches to him as to an ordinary assignee. In my opinion he cannot be liable for any claim for which an ordinary assignee would not be liable."

I suppose no one would suggest that an ordinary assignee could be liable for a breach before he became assignee.

Then the lord justice goes on to say:

"It is true that the property of the debtor has vested in him, but his liability arises from the statutory transfer, and in my opinion it ought not to be extended so as to make it relate back to a period previous to that at which the debtor's estate vested in him."

Suppose instead of bankruptcy there had been an assignment, the assignees could never have been liable. If it had been the case of an ordinary assignment, on what principle could it have been contended that the landlord could have had a right to recover rent due before? This is just the same as if the plaintiff had been an ordinary assignee. I quite agree that Re Sneezum (1) has no bearing whatever upon this case. It seems to me that the answer to the question, that being reduced to £150, one year's rent which had accrued due before the bankruptcy, is that he has no right of set-off.

"whether the defendant is under the circumstances entitled to set off against the claim of the plaintiff the rent amounting to £450 or any part thereof."

Company—Shares—Transfer—Registration—Wrongful refusal to register—Damages.

C

The plaintiff transferred shares in the defendant company to a creditor on the terms that the shares were to be accepted by the creditor in reduction of the plaintiff's debt at their market price at the date of the registration of the transfer. These terms were not known to the company, and the transfer was expressed to be made in consideration of five shillings. The company, who by their articles of association were entitled to refuse to register a transfer by a person who owed them money, refused to register the transfer, on the ground that the plaintiff was indebted to them. Afterwards it was shown that he was not indebted, and the company registered the transfer, but the shares had then fallen in value, and the plaintiff sued to recover damages for the wrongful refusal to register.

Held: as the terms on which the plaintiff parted with the shares had not been brought to the knowledge of the company, they were not liable for the loss occasioned by the fall in value of the shares, and the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and A. L. SMITH, J.), in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant company to recover damages for the refusal of the company to enter in the register of members of the company the name of a person to whom the plaintiff had transferred certain shares.

I

At the trial, which took place in the Mayor's Court before the recorder of London and a jury, it appeared that the plaintiff had been the holder of 1,300 shares in the defendant company, and on Nov. 1, 1882, he executed a transfer of these shares to a Mr. Levy. The transfer was expressed to be made in consideration of 5s., but evidence was given to show that the plaintiff was indebted to Mr. Levy, who had agreed to accept the shares in reduction of the debt at their market value at the date of the registration of the transfer. There was no evidence that the existence of this agreement had been brought to the knowledge of the company. Shortly after execution the transfer was sent to the office of the company to be registered; but the company, who by their articles of association were entitled to refuse to register a transfer executed by a transferor who was indebted to them, refused to enter the name of the transferee, Mr. Levy, in the register of their members, alleging that the transferor, the present plaintiff, was indebted to the company, and also that he was a partner in a firm which was indebted to them. The company brought an action against the present plaintiff to recover the money alleged to be due to them, and it was decided that he was not liable. Afterwards, in April, 1884, the company entered the name of Mr. Levy in their register of members as transferee of the shares. In November, 1882, when the company refused to register the transfer, the quoted price of the shares in the market was 26s. or 27s. each, and in April, 1884, when they did register, the value of the shares had fallen to 10s. each. The plaintiff claimed to recover, as damages for the wrongful refusal to register, the difference between the value of the shares at the date of such refusal and the value to which they had fallen at the date of the registration of the transfer. The jury, under the direction of the Recorder, found a verdict for the plaintiff for £1,248. The Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and A. L. SMITH, J.) directed a new trial on the ground that the damages were excessive, but gave the plaintiff leave to appeal. The plaintiff appealed from this decision.

By the Companies Act, 1867, s. 26 :

"A company shall, on the application of the transferor of any share or interest in the company, enter in its register of members the name of the transferee of such share or interest, in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application for such entry were made by the transferee."

Cohen, Q.C. (Masterman with him), for the plaintiff.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Fletcher Moulton for the defendants.

SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—This is an action brought to recover damages from the defendant company for their wrongful refusal to enter in their register of members the name of a person to whom the plaintiff had transferred certain shares. The plaintiff had applied to the company, under s. 26 of the Companies Act, 1867, to enter in their register the name of a Mr. Levy, to whom he had transferred the shares in question. His case was that he had made a valid transfer of the shares, and the company, by s. 26 of the statute, were bound to enter the name of the transferee in their register of members, and they had refused to do so. It has been proved that they wrongfully refused to enter the name of the transferee. They would have had a right to refuse if a debt had been due to them from the plaintiff, but they took the risk whether the allegation that a debt was due was true or not, and as it was shown that such an allegation was not, in fact, true, it follows that the company were in the wrong, and have committed a breach of their statutory duty. Whether they have committed a breach of contract or not is immaterial. The plaintiff, therefore, is clearly entitled to recover nominal damages, at least; but it is alleged that in this case he is entitled to substantial damages.

No doubt, under certain circumstances, substantial damages may be recovered for a breach of duty such as that which is complained of in the present case. If the name of the transferor is left on the register after he has applied to have it removed, he may be a loser, as, for instance, he may have to pay calls on the shares, if calls are made after the refusal to put the name of the transferee on the register, which involves keeping his own name on. Here, however, there was no evidence of any such damage. The plaintiff says that he has suffered loss by the falling of the shares in the market between the time when the company ought to have and the time when they did put the name of Mr. Levy, to whom the plaintiff had transferred his shares, on the register. The question is whether, assuming the alleged contract between the plaintiff and Mr. Levy to be proved, the company can be made liable for the loss which the plaintiff has sustained by reason of the shares having fallen in value before Mr. Levy's name was placed on the register. If the contract were a special, and not an ordinary contract, the case would come within the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), and the company would not be

A liable unless the terms of the contract were brought to their notice. If the terms were not brought to their notice the company was not bound to assume that the contract was other than the ordinary contract for the sale and purchase of shares. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether this was the ordinary contract, and that raises the question what the ordinary contract is.

B The usual contract before the Companies Act, 1867, as stated in Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2), was that the seller should execute a valid transfer, and hand over the certificate to the transferee, and do all in his power to enable the transferee to insist on his right to have the transfer registered. This agrees with what was laid down by LORD CAIRNS in Ward and Henry's Case (3). The seller had to execute a valid transfer, and the transferee had to get himself registered as holder of the shares, and clear the transferor from all liability which might arise from his name being on the register.

C Then comes the question whether any change is made by s. 26 of the Companies Act, 1867. That is a point which required some consideration, but I have come to the conclusion that the section does not alter the contract, and it is still the duty of the transferee to get himself registered as holder of the shares. The section is for the protection of the transferor, and if the transferee does not perform his part of the contract it gives power to the transferor, for his own protection, to get the name of the transferee registered, but it has no effect on the contract. I am, therefore, of opinion that the company is only liable for such damages as would have arisen if the contract had been an ordinary contract. If it were the ordinary contract, the plaintiff would still have the right to the price of the shares as against the transferee, and, therefore, he cannot recover against the company the difference caused by the peculiar nature of the contract unless the nature of the contract was called to the attention of the company when they committed the breach of duty. It follows that in this case only nominal damages are recoverable, and that it was the duty of the court so to direct the jury. Counsel for the plaintiff is willing to accept judgment for nominal damages if we think no more is recoverable, and therefore there will be no new trial, but the verdict will be entered for nominal damages, and this appeal will be dismissed.

F BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When the transfer was left at the office of the company they were not bound to know more than appeared from the terms of the document, according to which the consideration was 5s. They were, however, bound to register the transfer. By their articles of association the company were entitled to refuse to register the transfer while a debt remained due to them from the transferor. But it turned out that the claim made by the company against the plaintiff had no foundation, and the transfer was registered in April, 1884, nearly eighteen months after its execution. The company were clearly wrong in refusing to register the transfer, and are liable in damages; but the question is, What is the measure of damages? The plaintiff might have had calls to pay on the shares, or the company might have been wound-up, and he might have been made liable as a contributory; but there is no evidence of any such damage here. It was contended that, although on the face of the transfer the agreement was to dispose of the shares for 5s., we should read, instead of the consideration so expressed, the market value of the shares when registered. It may be that this was the consideration as between the plaintiff and Levy; but there are no circumstances to show that the company were affected with notice of this. Transfers for a nominal consideration are frequently made, as, for instance, in the case of trustees. I think the company had a right to consider the transfer as made for a nominal consideration, and are liable for nominal damages only.

I BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—After-acquired property—Future profits—Assignment by debtor—Right of trustee in bankruptcy.

A bankrupt cannot, by any assignment or charge, give a good title as against his trustee to profits of his business which will arise after the commencement of his bankruptcy.

The debtors, who were lessees of a place of public amusement adjoining a railway station, agreed with the railway company that the latter should collect, not only the railway fares, but also the admission fees of persons frequenting the place of amusement, and should pay a proportion of the moneys received to the debtors. The debtors afterwards assigned the moneys due under the agreement with the company to brewers to secure the price of goods supplied on credit. The debtors having filed a petition for liquidation,

Held: as the profits payable in futuro were not property of the debtors which they could assign, the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the receipts from the business accruing after the act of bankruptcy.

Appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar BROUGHAM sitting as Chief Judge in bankruptcy.

The debtors, Jones and Barber, were the lessees of and carried on business at Alexandra Palace, and by a verbal contract between them and the Great Northern Rail. Co., which had a station adjoining the grounds of the palace, it was agreed that the railway company should take, in addition to the railway fares of passengers over their lines to the palace, the admission fees of such passengers to the palace, and should pay the debtors a proportion of the sums so received for railway fares and admission fees, viz., 11d. for every first-class passenger, 9d. for every second-class passenger, and 7d. for every third-class passenger: and in case of excursions

A (which only applied to third-class passengers) it was agreed that the proportion payable to the debtors should vary according to the number of passengers to the palace, the minimum proportion to be 5d. for adults and 2½d. for school children, and the maximum the full ordinary proportion. The railway company were to render a monthly account. By an indenture dated Feb. 25, 1882, and made between the debtors, of the one part, and Henry Johnston Younger, Alexander B Smith, and Alexander Low Bruce (trading as William Younger & Co.), of the other part, in consideration of a past debt and future advances and an agreement by William Younger & Co. to supply the debtors with ale and stout, the debtors jointly and severally covenanted for repayment, and appointed Younger, Smith, and Bruce their attorneys to

C "ask, demand, sue for, recover, and receive from the Great Northern Rail. Co. all sums of money now due and owing, and hereafter to become due and owing from the said company" to the debtors, and to give receipts for the same. And it was declared that the moneys so received should be applied as far as the same would extend in payment of the money due to Younger & Co. Many further advances were made by Younger & Co. to the debtors.

D By an indenture dated Mar. 21, 1882, and made between the same parties, reciting the above indenture, and that £1,800 and an arrear of interest were due to Younger & Co., and that the debtors had requested a further advance, and that Younger & Co. had agreed to make further advances on the repayment of the £1,800 and interest, the further advances, and the amounts to become due for goods sold, secured in manner thereafter appearing. It was witnessed that, for the considerations aforesaid and in consideration of the premises, the debtors did thereby

E "assign unto the said William Younger & Co., their executors, administrators, and assigns, all and every the sums and sum of money now due and owing, and hereafter to become due and owing from the Great Northern Rail. Co. to the said Jones and Barber, or either of them. To hold the same sums and sum of money unto the said William Younger & Co., their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust to pay the expenses incurred in recovering and receiving the same, or otherwise in relation to the premises, and in the next place to apply such moneys in or towards payment or satisfaction of the moneys for the time being owing from the debtors, and to pay the surplus, if any, to the debtors."

G And the debtors thereby confirmed the power of attorney above mentioned. On April 3, 1882, notice in writing of the power of attorney and assignment was given to the railway company by Younger & Co.. On Aug. 10, 1882, Jones and Barber filed a petition for the liquidation of their affairs by arrangement. At that date the sum of £5,286 6s. 1d. was due by the debtors to Younger & Co. Alexandra Palace was kept open by the receiver, and afterwards by the same person when appointed trustee in the liquidation. A sum of £587 3s. 8d. due from the railway company under the verbal contract in respect of railway fares and admission fees subsequently to the filing of the liquidation petition was claimed by Younger & Co. and by the trustee, and was accordingly paid into a bank to await the decision of the court as to the person entitled to it. MR. REGISTRAR BROUGHAM decided that Younger & Co. were entitled to the sum in the bank. The trustee appealed.

I E. C. Willis, Q.C., and J. C. Earle for the trustee.
Winslow, Q.C., and B. Houghton for the mortgagees.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This is a total misapprehension of the nature of the bankruptcy law. Let us consider what the contract was. Jones and Barber carried on the Alexandra Palace, and they arranged with the Great Northern Rail. Co. that the moneys paid by the public for conveyance to the palace, and admission into it, should be received by the railway company in one gross sum, and afterwards divided between them and the debtors in certain specified proportions. The company were to carry the public, and Jones and Barber were to admit them. What is the meaning of the contract? It makes the railway company the agents of Jones and Barber to receive their share of the gross charges. Under ordinary circumstances there would have been two charges, one for conveyance and the other for admission. This arrangement was made for the convenience of the public, and probably also of the debtors. No doubt the railway company became debtors to Jones and Barber for their share of the gross sums received under the arrangement, but the arrangement was nothing more than an agreement for the gross sum paid by the public for conveyance and admission. The so-called debt was simply in respect of the receipt by the railway company from the public of the charges paid by the public for admission to the palace, and it makes no difference that they received it, not under an implied but under an express contract. It only became a debt due to Jones and Barber after the railway company had received it. It is just the same thing as if the company had been agents paid to receive the money at the doors of the palace. It is just the same case as receiving money at the doors of a theatre. It represents the gross earnings of the persons who are carrying on the trade.

That being so, and the debtors having become bankrupt, the bankruptcy relates back to the act of bankruptcy on which it is founded, and the receipts from the business after the act of bankruptcy, which are in the hands of an agent, go to the trustee in the bankruptcy. The income derived from the business after the act of bankruptcy passes to the trustee. These sums are simply payments made by customers, for admission to the palace, to the person who was carrying on the business. There is no difference in principle as regards payments of this kind between the Alexandra Palace and a theatre or a cheesemonger's shop. The sums of money received for admission are equivalent to sums paid over the counter for the purchase of cheese. The title of the trustee relates back to the act of bankruptcy; that is, to the filing of the petition for liquidation.

It is said that the payments were received by the railway company under a contract which the trustee affirmed. But the trustee would have had a right to the debtor's share of the gross sums received by the company even if he had annulled the contract. The only difference made by adopting the contract was, that he assented to the division of the gross sum in the proportions laid down by the company; he did not adopt the contract in any other sense. That being so, his title is quite unaffected by any assent to the contract. It is said that the respondents are claiming under a mortgage or assignment made by the debtors before bankruptcy. The answer is that by no assignment or charge can a bankrupt give a good title, as against his trustee, to the profits of his business which will arise after the commencement of his bankruptcy. The future profits are not his property within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. It was a mere accident that the business in this case went on after the proceedings had commenced; but, being so carried on, it was carried on ex relatione by the trustee for the benefit of the debtor's estate. The case bears no analogy to cases in which the property of the bankrupt has been validly charged by him before his bankruptcy. This sum of money was not the property of the debtors, and they could not validly assign it as against the trustee.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument arises from some little confusion of thought, and it seeks to apply the principles of Holroyd v. Marshall (2), where there was an equitable assignment of after-acquired chattels, to an assignment like the one in the present case. Nothing appears to turn on the exact language of the assignment. It is in terms an assignment of moneys due and to become due from the railway company. I think it would in substance be the same thing if it were an assignment of moneys due and to become due from the railway company under the prior arrangement. It is an agreement to assign to Younger & Co., not the property of Jones and Barber, but money which would become due to them under the arrangement with the railway company. There was no specific property assigned, and the principles of Holroyd v. Marshall (2) do not apply. It was a mere agreement,

A for the breach of which an action would lie, and the title of the so-called assignees cannot prevail when asserted as to money paid after the title of the trustee accrued, that is the filing of the liquidation petition. The decision in Brice v. Bannister (1) turned on the principle that the right of an equitable assignee of a debt cannot be defeated by a voluntary payment in advance by the debtor to the assignor.

B BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. These profits payable in futuro were not property of the debtors which they could assign so as to defeat the title of the trustee in their liquidation.

Appeal allowed.

I Application by the trustee of a bankrupt for an order directing the bankrupt's solicitor to refund sums paid to him by the debtor for the purpose of opposing a bankruptcy petition.

On Mar. 9 a bankruptcy petition was presented against the debtor Sinclair, on the ground that he had departed from his dwelling-house with the intention of defeating and delaying his creditors. On Mar. 10 an interim receiver was appointed in accordance with an application under s. 10 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 8 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 336)].

The debtor instructed Mr. Norman, a solicitor, to oppose the petition, and to move to rescind the order appointing the official receiver interim receiver, and at the request of the solicitor paid to him the sum of £25 for that purpose. The opposition having been unsuccessful and the debtor having been adjudicated bankrupt, the trustee applied for an order directing the solicitor to refund the money. A

F. C. Willis for the trustee.

Herbert Reed for the solicitor. B

CAYE, J.—This is an apparently unprecedented application and must be dismissed; if it were granted the necessary consequence would be that the presentation of a bankruptcy petition would place a debtor in a most unfortunate position. At the very time when he stood in paramount need of legal assistance he would be practically debarred from it, if money paid to a solicitor for services rendered could be subsequently recovered by the trustee in bankruptcy. Nobody could be expected to undertake his case under such circumstances. In Re Chapman (1), which has been quoted, the circumstances were altogether different. The money was paid on account of the petitioning creditor's debt; here it is paid in order to cover counsel's fees for opposing the proceedings. I cannot hold that, where a solicitor receives his instructions to oppose a petition, and does his work honestly, and is paid for it, the trustee is entitled to recover the money from the solicitor merely because the opposition has not succeeded. It would not be more unreasonable to hold that a baker who sells a man a loaf for ready money, knowing the man to have committed an act of bankruptcy, could be called upon to refund the money to the trustee in bankruptcy. Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (POLLOCK, B., and MANISTY, J.), directing a writ of habeas corpus to issue for the delivery up of an illegitimate female child, aged seven years, to a Mr. and Mrs. Wright.

- D The mother of the child, Rose Carey, originally applied to NORTH, J., for a writ of habeas corpus for delivery up of her child to her by Mr. and Mrs. Nash in whose care the child was. It appeared from the mother's evidence, in support of her application, that the child was born in May, 1876; that the putative father denied that she was his child; that shortly after the birth of the child she was put out to nurse with Mr. and Mrs. Nash, with whom, except for one short interval, she had since remained; and that Mr. and Mrs. Nash were poor people, subsisting partly on charity, and partly on what Mr. Nash got from odd jobs as a day labourer. In affidavits filed on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Nash it was alleged that Rose Carey gained her living by prostitution; that Mr. and Mrs. Nash were not living upon charity; that the child was being well brought up; and that Mr. and Mrs. Nash's reasons for keeping her were their affection for her, and their wish to preserve her from an immoral life. NORTH, J., refused to order the writ to be issued on the ground that Rose Carey was not a proper person to have the custody of the child.

- E Rose Carey then applied to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division for a writ of habeas corpus requiring the child to be brought up and delivered over to the custody of Mr. and Mrs. Wright, a brother-in-law and sister of the applicant.
- G In a further affidavit, filed by Rose Carey, in support of this application, she stated that she was seduced, when living with her parents and under the age of fifteen years, by an officer in the army; that her father, who was a gardener, insisted on her taking proceedings against the father of the child, and on her refusing to do so turned her out of doors; that her mother died two months before the applicant's confinement; that, her sister being out at service, Mr. and Mrs. Nash, whom she had known since she was six years old, and who lived near her father's house, were the only persons she could think of or turn to to mind the child; that she afterwards got a situation as waitress, which she retained until it was proved the work was too much for her, and she was laid up for three months in an infirmary; that when she came out she was offered the protection of a gentleman, and under such protection had "since lived in a respectable way." Mr. Wright also made an affidavit stating that for the past eleven years he had been a clerk in the employ of the Press Association; that he was married to the applicant's sister, and had one child, who was then living; that he was acquainted with the manner of living of Rose Carey, and that she was not a prostitute; and that he was quite willing to take the guardianship of the child and bring her up with his own child. On this evidence the Divisional Court directed the writ of habeas corpus to issue for delivery of the child to Mr. and Mrs. Wright, and Mr. and Mrs. Nash appealed.

H. Lacy Fraser for Mr. and Mrs. Nash.

Herbert Reed for the mother.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—If ever a judgment was right, it is the one now appealed from. This unfortunate young woman was seduced when she was fourteen years old, and the consequence was that she had a child. Her father having turned her out of his house, she found herself compelled to put her child out to nurse with poor people in the neighbourhood whom she intended to pay for their trouble, and it appears that she did give them some money which she obtained from her seducer. Then she came up to London and got a situation as a waitress. After a time her strength failed her, she was obliged to throw up her situation, and was unable to pay for the maintenance of the child. In the meantime the child was maintained by the poor people in whose custody she remained, and who were assisted by the contributions of charitable persons in the neighbourhood. The mother had to go into a public infirmary, and when she came out she went into the keeping of a gentleman, with whom she is still living—in that sense she is living an immoral life. She now wants to get her child back, and these poor people want to keep it from her—but they have no claim whatever to the child. They are mere strangers, and have not a particle of right to its custody, yet they contend by their counsel in this court that a natural mother is no relation to her child, and has no more right to its custody than a mere stranger. A

The absurdity of their claim cannot be exaggerated. It is true that MAULE, J., in Re Lloyd (1), is reported to have asked: "How does the mother of an illegitimate child differ from a stranger?" I should have thought the answer was: "Because she is its mother." The question was asked during the argument, and not when the learned judge was delivering his judgment in the case, and, knowing something of him, I think he must have intended the question as a joke. At any rate, if he did not mean to make a joke, he could only have been speaking of the strict legal right to the guardianship of an illegitimate child. But even at common law there were many cases in which the right of the mother to the custody of her illegitimate child was recognised, and LORD MANSFIELD, in Ex parte Knee (2), held that she was so entitled unless good cause was shown to the contrary. Her rights are also recognised by the poor law, which imposes on her the liability to maintain her illegitimate child. But now the courts are courts of equity, as well as of law, and the question is not to be decided with reference only to the legal rights which were formerly considered in granting writs of habeas corpus, for equity does consider the natural relationship, not only of the mother of an illegitimate child, but of the putative father and the relations on the mother's side. B

What is to be regarded is the benefit of the child, and that kind of blood relationship, though it was not always recognised at law, gives a preference when there are conflicting claims to the custody of an illegitimate child. In this case the mother says: "I do not want you to give the child to me, but to give her to my sister, who is a respectable married woman, the wife of a respectable man." The sister's husband is a clerk, and in a position far superior to that of Mr. and Mrs. Nash, and he is willing to take charge of the child. I cannot understand why this contest has been raised. To me this appears to be the plainest possible case for ordering the child to be delivered to blood relations, who will give it every possible care and a better education than that which the appellants could give it. In my opinion, no order was ever more rightly made, and this appeal ought to be dismissed. C

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In some respects this is a very painful case. There is no apparent reason for depriving Nash and his wife of the custody of the child, except the superior right of her mother. There is no suggestion that they have been unkind to or neglectful of it. But they have no more right to the custody of the child than any other stranger has, and the affection even of a natural mother gives a better right than the regard of a mere stranger. The child is now at school, and no doubt the fact of her having been taken up by some district visitor is at the bottom of the whole affair. D

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt that this appeal has been brought with the best of motives in the supposed interest of the child; E

A but philanthropy sometimes makes mistakes, and this is one of them. It is said that the mother is not entitled to the legal guardianship of the child. But that is not the question. The question is whether, as between the mother and a stranger, the court, in deciding who is to have the custody of an illegitimate child, ought not to give preference to the mother. It is said that the mother is not respectable, but she asks that her sister may have the custody of the child, and it seems to me

B the scale is turned in favour of her demand, when it appears that the child is to be given into the care of respectable people. I have no hesitation in saying that the decision of the court below is right in principle and upon the merits. I am satisfied that it is the best for the child itself, and that it ought to be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

F Fatal Accident—Negligence—Exemption from liability—Condition in ticket for sea voyage—Deceased deprived of right to sue if he had not been killed—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict., c. 93), s. 1.

The ticket of a passenger on the defendants' ship contained a notice that the defendants would not be responsible "for the maintenance of passengers or . . . for any loss or damage arising from perils of the sea, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners." Through the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants the defendants' ship was sunk after a collision with another vessel at sea and the passenger lost his life. In an action brought by the passenger's executors under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846,

Held: personal injury to a passenger was covered by the condition in the ticket, and so, if the passenger had not died, he would not have been entitled to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof within s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846; accordingly, the action failed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Divisional Court (CAVE and DAY, JJ.), reported 48 L.T. 267, in an action brought by the plaintiffs, executors of the will of Charles Schwind, deceased, for the benefit of and on behalf of his wife and children, for damages caused by the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants on board the defendants' steamship Douro, which had resulted in the deceased losing his life when the ship sank after a collision at sea.

The defendants, among other defences, alleged that the contract of carriage between themselves and the said Charles Schwind exempted them from liability for the alleged negligence, and relied on the following clause which was contained in the ticket given by them to Charles Schwind when he paid his passage money:

"The company will not be responsible for the maintenance of passengers, or for their loss of time, or any consequence resulting therefrom, during any detention consequent upon the occurrence of any cause to prevent the vessels from meeting at the appointed places, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the sea, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners, etc."

By the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, s. 1:

"Whosoever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured."

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30, 1883. SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—The question to be determined in this case is whether the executors of Schwind can maintain an action against the defendants under Lord Campbell's Act (the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846) on behalf of the widow and children of the deceased; and they certainly can, unless they are prevented by something beyond the mere law of negligence.

The defendants rely upon a contract entered into between themselves and the deceased, by virtue of which, if the accident had happened without causing his death, he would not have been entitled to recover against them. For the plaintiffs it was argued that the representatives of the deceased could recover on behalf of the widow and children, although if he had survived he might not have been entitled

A to recover. I am of opinion that this contention is inconsistent with the obvious interpretation of Lord Campbell's Act, and that it is clear, under the statute, that the executors can recover only where the deceased himself could have recovered if he had not been killed.

The question, therefore, is whether the contract between the defendants and the deceased would have prevented him from maintaining an action against them for
B personal injury caused to him by the negligence of their servants. That question depends upon the construction of the passenger's ticket, which formed the contract relied upon by the defendants. The ticket was given to the defendant as a receipt for the passage money paid by him for the carriage of himself and his luggage, and applied both to the person and the luggage of the passenger. With regard to the luggage, this stipulation contained in the ticket, was that the defendants would
C not be responsible "for any loss, damage, or detention of luggage under any circumstances." In Thompson v. Royal Mail Packet Co. (1) the Court of Exchequer (KELLY, C.B., BRAMWELL and CLEASBY, BB.) construed a stipulation which was in very similar terms to that contained in the ticket in the present case. The words there were,

D "the company will not be responsible for any loss or damage to luggage in any circumstances," and the court held that the words "in any circumstances" applied to loss or damage to luggage occasioned by negligence. It had been previously decided (see Martin v. Great Indian Peninsular Rail. Co. (2)) that a stipulation that the company would not be responsible for any loss or detention of goods did not include loss occasioned

E by negligence. After that decision, the words "under any circumstances" were inserted in the contract, in addition to the words which had been held insufficient to cover a loss occasioned by negligence. I agree with the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Thompson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. (1), and I think these words must have been intended to carry the case further, and that they would be sufficient to include loss or damage to luggage occasioned by negligence.

F If that is so, the ticket in the present case would cover the case of loss or damage to luggage. The ticket, however, is also a passenger ticket, and contains the stipulation against responsibility with regard to passengers on which the defendants rely. I confess this seems to me to be a somewhat odd stipulation for I cannot understand how there can be any loss or damage to a passenger, as such, exclusive
G of loss or damage to his property, for which the shipowner could be liable if it were caused by perils of the sea. Again, by reason of the words "from machinery, boilers, or steam," if damage were caused by the accidental explosion of a boiler, or from some accident not occasioned by negligence, the shipowners would not be liable. Therefore, if we exclude the words which are inapplicable to the present case, the stipulation as to passengers will read as follows: "The company will H not be responsible for any loss or damage arising from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners." It has been suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that the word "damage" cannot be correctly applied to personal injury, and certainly it is not a very usual expression to say that a man is damaged; it seems more natural to say that he is hurt. Personal injury cannot be included under the word "loss"; but, although "injury" would have been a more apt word,
I I think there can be no doubt that "damage" may include personal injury. Here the sentence in which the word occurs appears to be solely applicable to passengers personally, and we are unable to come to the conclusion that personal injury is not covered by the words of the stipulation; and we think that personal injury to a passenger, caused by the negligence of the pilot, master, or mariners, is an injury from which the defendants have relieved themselves by the contract contained in the ticket.

After careful consideration of the case, and after considerable hesitation, we have come to the conclusion that we cannot differ from the decision of the Divisional

Court, and we think that if the passenger had not been killed, but only injured, he could not have recovered for the injury. If this is so, it follows that his executors cannot recover under Lord Campbell's Act. We are, therefore, of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Easement—Implied grant—Easement of necessity—Reservation implied from nature of transaction.

Where an easement is an easement of necessity, there is no need of an express reservation of such easement in a conveyance of the property to be affected by the easement. Reservation is a matter of legal presumption, to be implied from the nature of the transaction between the grantor and grantee.

C Case Stated by the arbitrator with the consent of both parties and in pursuance of an order made at the hearing of the action in which the plaintiffs sought to recover damages for injuries to two houses which they owned and alleged to have been damaged by the defendant's making a drain through land of his adjoining the plaintiffs' two houses.

D The defendant was the owner in fee of certain land called "Tufnell Park Estate," which he divided into plots for building purposes. On Mar. 22, 1878, the defendant demised to one Clarkson, for a term of ninety-nine years, two plots of the said land with the dwelling-houses thereon erected. The said plots were numbered and known as 164 and 166, Tufnell Park Road. A third plot included in the said lease was afterwards converted into a private road, and adjoined the said two plots of land. The said road was a portion of the Tufnell Park Estate. On May 31, 1878, Clarkson demised to L. G. Shubbrook (whose executors the plaintiffs were), for a term of ninety-nine years, the two plots of land, No. 164 and No. 166, with the dwelling-houses thereon erected. The private road was not included in the last-mentioned demise, but on May 12, 1879, it was leased by Clarkson to one South, for a term of ninety-nine years. This private road ran alongside of and actually adjoined the side wall of the house No. 164. In October, 1878, the defendant, at the alleged request of the lessee of the private road, made a drain through it to the main sewer in the Tufnell Park Road. The two houses, Nos. 164 and 166, sustained considerable structural damage, and the plaintiffs attributed it to the drain, and to subsidence (caused by the construction thereof) of the adjoining ground upon which the two houses were built, and they complained that the drain deprived the houses of their support from the road to which they contended they were entitled. It was contended on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff had no cause of action, as he had not shown any right of support.

G The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts stated (and on the assumption that the damage was in fact attributable to the drain works), there was any cause of action by reason of an infringement of a legal right of support in the plaintiffs.

J. C. Lawrence, Q.C. (Sills with him), for the plaintiffs.

H H. Matthews, Q.C. (Fellowes and R. A. McCall with him), for the defendant.

I MANISTY, J.—Though this Case is so stated that we have had a good deal of difficulty in getting at the facts, yet as they appear to stand they are within a small compass. There are but very few material dates. In February, 1878, Clarkson, being the equitable owner of all this property, viz., the plots marked in the Case 164 and 166, and that called "The Road," being in fact the owner of the entirety, entered into the contract with Morgan to let the plot called "The Road" for a term of ninety years, commencing from Lady Day, 1877. There must have been some such binding arrangement as this, which it is unnecessary to state, because that which was done later on in October, 1878, was said to be done "at the request of the lessee of the private road." That is, Clarkson had made a demise of the premises which could have been specifically enforced. Thus, in February, 1878, this property was partly in possession of Clarkson, and partly in that of Morgan and of those claiming under him. At this time there was no lease of the houses 164 and 166; then came a demise of these houses from Clarkson A to the plaintiffs' predecessor in title on May 31, 1878.

In October, 1878, the drain was constructed which has caused the alleged damage. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs is that, Clarkson, having severed the entirety through his contract with Morgan, neither Morgan nor those claiming under him had any right so to use this particular road as structurally to injure the houses 164 and 166. The defendant, on the contrary, says that, immediately after B the making of the contract of February, 1878, Morgan or those claiming under him could, as against Clarkson, have so used this road, on the principle that a grantor cannot derogate from his own grant. These two houses did suffer structural damage. Had then Morgan and those claiming under him, even if lessees, the right so to use their property as to do structural injury to houses belonging to Clarkson which he has since parted with to the plaintiffs? C

I agree with most of the principles advanced by the defendant, and hold it to be now settled that there is no implied reservation of easements, when the owner of an entirety parts with a portion of his property, except such as are known as quasi easements or ways of necessity for the benefit of that part not granted: Wheeldon v. Burrows (1). So, on the other hand, as regards grants, what are the mutual rights of grantor and grantee? What are the rights of the grantee under D this particular contract? Was he entitled to do what he liked with his property, even to the extent of letting down the structures belonging to his grantor? I think the expression "easement of necessity" quite right and apt, and that the plaintiffs here had an "easement of necessity," for these houses were bound to be injured and let down by the action of the defendant. For such there was no need of an express reservation of such a right. There are no doubt instances in which such E express reservation is necessary, as where an owner of land conveys the minerals under the surface, retaining in himself the ownership of the surface. Unless the owner of the surface has by the instrument contracted himself out of his right, by allowing the owner of the minerals to win and take them in every possible way, even to the letting down of the surface, he has the right of subjacent support. The reservation of such rights as easements of necessity is a matter of legal pre- F sumption, and is implied from the nature of the transaction between the parties. This disposes of the case, and judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

WATKIN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The facts are very short and simple. In February, 1878, this land was divided into three plots, viz., 164, 166, and 164A, otherwise known as G the road plot. On May 31, 1878, Clarkson conveyed the plot 164, with the house on it, nearly finished, to the plaintiffs' predecessor in title. In October, 1878, the defendant, acting on the request of one South, who claimed through Clarkson, so excavated a drain through the road plot, which had been made a private road, to a cricket field, as to cause a crack in and do serious structural damage to house H
No. 164. The plaintiffs claimed damages for such injury, and based their claim on the conveyance of May 31, 1878, for by it they alleged that they had acquired a right by implication to the support of the house on plot 164 from the adjoining plot 164A. To that the defendant replied in the negative, on the ground that before I the conveyance of May 31, 1878, viz., in February, 1878, Clarkson had already parted, not with the legal, but equitable estate in plot 164A by an arrangement with one Morgan, which was subsequently completed by a conveyance to one South in May, 1879. The defendant alleged that the rights of the parties in October, 1878, were governed as though the then existing agreement had been the actual conveyance between them, and that there had not been in such conveyance a sufficient reservation by Clarkson of the right of support for the house already erected on plot 164. Supposing there had been a valid conveyance of the two plots, would Clarkson have reserved by implication the right of support for the house which in May, 1878, was conveyed by him? It is clear that such a right was reserved by implication of law by the transaction in February, 1878, which

A amounted to an equitable lease of the private road to Morgan. This case comes within the exceptions stated by THESIGER, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (1), as being of the nature of a quasi easement, or easement of necessity. Counsel would be driven by his contention to say, that if the owner of a house let it out in stories to different occupants, the occupants of the lower stories would not be bound to keep their floors in order, so as to afford proper support to those above them. Here

B the right of support was a necessary incident to the enjoyment of the property, and the reservation of it was implied in the act of severance. On these grounds I found my judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, and think they have a good cause of action.

Case remitted.

Carriage of Passengers—Safety of passengers—Hire of carriage—Duty of care—
"To supply carriage as fit for purpose for which it is hired as care and skill can render it."

F The plaintiff hired from the defendant, a jobmaster, a carriage, horses, and a driver for a journey. While on the journey a bolt in the under part of the carriage broke causing the horses to become frightened and to overturn the carriage, whereby the plaintiff was injured. It was proved that neither the driver nor the horses had been at fault. The carriage had been properly built by a reputable firm and had been repaired some fifteen months before by a competent repairer. The defendant had no reason to suspect that the bolt was defective, and the defect could not have been discovered by ordinary inspection.

G The defendant did not produce the bolt and prove the exact nature of the defect. In an action by the plaintiff for negligence the judge directed the jury that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove negligence, and that if, in their opinion, the defendant did not know of the defective bolt and had taken all reasonable care to provide a fit and proper carriage, they should find for him.

H The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant. On appeal,

I Held: although a person who hired out carriages was not an insurer against all defects he was an insurer against all defects which care and skill could guard against; his duty was to supply a carriage as fit for the purpose for which it was hired as care and skill could render it, and if, while the carriage was being properly used for such purpose, it broke down, it became incumbent on him to show that the breakdown was not preventible by any care and skill; and, therefore, the judge's direction was wrong and a new trial would be ordered.

Per MATHEW, J.: The question which the jury ought to have been asked was whether the carriage was in fact reasonably safe when it was hired by the plaintiff.

Appeal from a decision of HAWKINS, J., and a jury in an action brought by the plaintiff and his wife to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant in which a verdict had been entered for the defendant. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained on the grounds that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence and that the learned judge misdirected the jury.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 4, 1881. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, J.—The defendant in this case was a jobmaster at Brighton, letting out carriages and horses for hire. The plaintiff hired from him a landau and a pair of horses, and a driver, for a drive from Brighton to Shoreham and back. After having driven some way, and while the carriage was going down hill and slowly over a newly-mended part of the road, a bolt in the under part of the carriage broke. The splinter-bar became displaced, the horses started off, the carriage was upset, the plaintiff was thrown out and injured, and he brought this action for compensation. It was proved at the trial that no fault could be imputed to the horses nor to the driver, and although the plaintiff was charged with having caused the accident by pulling the reins, the jury found in the plaintiff's favour on this point, and nothing now turns upon it. It further appeared that the carriage had been built by a good builder some eight or nine years before the accident, had been repaired by a competent person about fifteen months before it; that the defendant had no reason to suppose that there was any defect in the

A carriage or any of its bolts; and that the defect, if any, in the bolt which broke could not have been discovered by any ordinary inspection. The bolt itself was not produced at the trial, and the nature of the defect, if any, in it when the carriage started was not proved. The learned judge at the trial told the jury in substance that the plaintiff was bound to prove that the injury which he had sustained was caused by the negligence of the defendant; and if in their opinion the defendant took all reasonable care to provide a fit and proper carriage, their verdict ought to be for him. Being thus directed, the jury found a verdict for the defendant, and in particular they found that the carriage was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was hired, and that the defect in the bolt could not have been discovered by the defendant by ordinary care and attention.

The plaintiff complains of this direction and of the verdict founded upon it, and we have to consider whether the direction was correct. The substance of the complaint against the direction to the jury is that it was too favourable to the defendant, inasmuch as the judge did not sufficiently explain the degree of care which the defendant was bound to take, and the jury were led to believe that the defendant was not liable for defects of which he knew nothing, and which were not discoverable by him by ordinary care and attention. The plaintiff also contends that the breaking of the bolt under no unusual strain rendered it incumbent on the defendant to show that the carriage when sent out was fit for its journey, and that the verdict on this point was against the weight of evidence, especially as the broken bolt was not produced.

The questions thus raised are of considerable difficulty and importance, and have rendered it necessary to examine a great number of authorities. The most important are the following: Christie v. Griggs (1); Bremner v. Williams (2); Sharp v. Grey (3); Readhead v. Midland Rail. Co. (4); Francis v. Cockrell (5); Fowler v. Lock (6); Searle v. Laverick (7); Kopitoff v. Wilson (8); Randall v. Newson (9); STORY ON BAILMENTS (ss. 498, 592). A careful study of these authorities leads me to the conclusion that the learned judge at the trial put the duty of the defendant too low. A person who lets out carriages is not, in my opinion, responsible for all defects, discoverable or not; he is not an insurer against all defects, nor is he bound to take more care than coach proprietors or railway companies who provide carriages for the public to travel in; but, in my opinion, he is bound to take as much care as they, and although not an insurer against all defects, he is an insurer against all defects which care and skill can guard against. His duty appears to me to be to supply a carriage as fit for the purpose for which it is hired as care and skill can render it; and if while the carriage is being properly used for such purpose it breaks down, it becomes incumbent on the person who has let it out to show that the breakdown was in the proper sense of the word an accident not preventible by any care or skill. If he can prove this, as the defendant did in Christie v. Griggs (1), and as the railway company did in Readhead v. Midland Rail. Co. (4), he will not be liable, but no proof short of this will exonerate him. Nor does it appear to me to be at all unreasonable to exact such vigilance from a person who makes it his business to let out carriages for hire. As between him and the hirer the risk of defects in the carriage, so far as care and skill can avoid them, ought to be thrown on the owner of the carriage. The hirer trusts him to supply a fit and proper carriage; the lender has it in his power not only to see that it is in a proper state, and to keep it so, and thus protect himself from risk, but also to charge his customers enough to cover his expenses.

Such being, in my opinion, the law applicable to the case, it follows that the direction given to the jury did not go far enough, and that it was not sufficient in order to exonerate the defendant from liability for him to prove that he did not know of any defect in the bolt; had no reason to suppose it was weak, and could not see that it was by an ordinary inspection of the carriage. It further follows, in my opinion, the evidence was not such as to warrant the finding that the carriage was in a fit and proper state when it left the defendant's yard. In many of the cases bearing on this subject the expression "reasonably fit and proper" is used.

This is a little ambiguous and requires explanation. In a case like the present, a carriage to be reasonably fit and proper must be as fit and proper as care and skill can make it for use in a reasonable and proper manner, i.e., as fit and proper as care and skill can make it to carry a reasonable number of people, conducting themselves in a reasonable manner, and going at a reasonable pace on the journey for which the carriage was hired; or (if no journey was specified) along roads, or over ground reasonably fit for carriages. A carriage not fit and proper in this sense would not be reasonably fit and proper, and vice versa. The expression "reasonably fit" denotes something short of absolutely fit; but in a case of this description the difference between the two expressions is not great.

It was objected on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff had in his statement of claim based his case on negligence on the part of the defendant, and not on any breach of warranty, express or implied, and consequently that the plaintiff could not recover in this action, at least, without amending. But the absence of such care as a person is by law bound to take is negligence; and whether the plaintiff sues the defendant in tort for negligence in not having supplied such a fit and proper carriage as he ought to have supplied, or whether the plaintiff sues him in contract for the breach of an implied warranty that the carriage was as fit and proper as it ought to have been, appears to me wholly immaterial. Upon this point I adopt the opinion of MARTIN, B., in Francis v. Cockrell (5), which is based upon and warranted by Brown v. Boorman (10). The plaintiff's pleadings would have been free from all objection if he had stated in his statement of claim that he hired the carriage of the defendant, and not merely that the plaintiff was lawfully in the carriage. But the defendant knew under what circumstances the plaintiff was lawfully in it, and there was no surprise or miscarriage of justice occasioned by the omission of the statement of the fact of hiring. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff ought not to be precluded from recovering in this action as the pleadings stand, if the facts come out in his favour. For the above reasons I am of opinion that there should be a new trial, and that the costs of the first trial and of this rule should abide the event.

MATHEW, J.—The learned judge appears to have considered that the plaintiff by his pleadings had undertaken to prove negligence, and to have told the jury that if they thought reasonable care and precaution had been taken by the defendant to ascertain that the carriage was safe, they might find that it was safe. In other words, the question whether the carriage was safe was treated as if it were the same with the question whether the defendant might have reasonably believed it to be safe. It appears to me that the question which the jury ought to have been asked was whether the carriage was in fact reasonably safe when it was hired by the plaintiff.

The cases referred to by my brother LINDLEY seem to show that there is no distinction in this respect between contracts for sale and for the hire of an article for a specific purpose, where trust is reposed in the person who, in the ordinary course of business, sells or lets to hire. The purpose and use, the time for which the article is intended to be used, seems to me the essential part of the contract. The warranty of seaworthiness in the case of a ship has been traced in many recent cases to its source in the ordinary contract for hiring an article for a specific purpose, and the obligation to provide a roadworthy carriage is not as onerous as the obligation to provide a seaworthy ship, which, in the absence of express terms, is implied in any contract of affreightment: Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (11). Here the defendant let the carriage for the purpose of carrying the plaintiff safely. The plaintiff trusted him to select the carriage, horses, and driver, and there seems to me nothing unreasonable in charging the defendant with a duty which it was certainly in his power to fulfil, and which from his business he would be presumed to have bound himself to take the proper steps to perform strictly.

Reference has been made to the form of the pleadings, and it has been argued that the question of negligence was the only question raised by the statement of

A claim, and that his present contention is not open to the plaintiff. I conceive it to be the duty of a judge in cases of this description to permit such amendments as will permit the real questions in dispute between the litigants to be determined. It is only a question of terms. Here neither party insisted upon a strict construction of the pleadings. The learned judge would probably not have refused an adjournment if the defendant had made out that he was not in a position to meet the case made by the plaintiff at the trial. The defendant could hardly have made any such assertion with reason. The defendant knew that the plaintiff did not know how the accident had been brought about. It was from the defendant's witness, who was called to show that there was no defect in the construction of the carriage, that important evidence was obtained as to the broken bolt. The defendant could not reasonably complain that this evidence was any surprise to him. I only add that I do not think the defect in question could be regarded as a latent defect, if the obligation of the hirer be restricted to defects which are not latent—a point which it is unnecessary at present to discuss.

Rule absolute.

G Malicious Prosecution—Defence—Honest belief that offence had been committed.

In an action for malicious prosecution, in the course of his summing-up to the jury, the trial judge directed them that if they thought that the defendant, acting upon an honest impression, the upshot of a fallacious memory, honestly believed that the plaintiff had committed perjury, then no jury would be justified in saying that the defendant had maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause prosecuted the plaintiff, as the best probable and reasonable cause would be that he honestly believed in the plaintiff's guilt.

Held: if the defendant honestly believed that the plaintiff had committed perjury this would negative any malice on his part, and, therefore, the direction was correct.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (HUDDLESTON, B., and HAWKINS, J.), discharging a rule nisi for a new trial in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for malicious prosecution. The action was tried by HUDDLESTON, B., with a jury and on the verdict of the jury judgment was entered for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed on the grounds that the trial judge had misdirected the jury, and also that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

The defendant was the landlord of a house in Belgrave Road, St. John's Wood. The plaintiff's father was the tenant of these premises. In February, 1879, the defendant brought a county court action against the plaintiff's father to recover alleged arrears of rent due after December, 1877. The defence to this action was that there had been a surrender of the tenancy on Dec. 17, 1877, before any of the rent became due. The surrender had been effected by giving up possession of the premises and by delivering the key of the house to the defendant who had accepted it. The plaintiff was called as a witness for his father and gave evidence that on Dec. 17, 1877, he had at the defendant's request given the key to him. Subsequently after the county court action the defendant indicted the plaintiff for perjury at the Central Criminal Court where at that trial the plaintiff was acquitted. The plaintiff then commenced proceedings against the defendant for malicious prosecution.

At the trial during his summing-up of the case to the jury the learned judge said that if the plaintiff had satisfied them he was telling the truth that he really did give up the key, and the defendant knowing he had done so, indicted him for perjury, the plaintiff would be entitled to their verdict. If on the other hand they disbelieved the plaintiff and came to the conclusion that what he said on oath was untrue and that he knew this to be so, the defendant was justified in the course he had taken. The learned judge further directed the jury that, if in substance they believed the plaintiff's version, their verdict ought to be for him, but that, if they thought the defendant was speaking the truth he was entitled to their verdict. If they thought the matter was left in such doubt that they could not arrive at a conclusion as to which of the parties was speaking correctly, then the plaintiff had not made out his case to their satisfaction and the defendant would be entitled to their verdict. The learned judge then proceeded to present another alternative view to the jury which the plaintiff contended was a misdirection. The learned judge told the jury that it might be they would come to the conclusion that the plaintiff did in fact deliver up the key as he swore, and that the defendant had a very treacherous memory and had forgotten all about it, and went on with the prosecution under the impression that he never had the key. Nevertheless, if that was an honest impression, the upshot of a fallacious memory, and acting upon it, he honestly believed the plaintiff had sworn falsely and corruptly, no jury would be justified in saying that the defendant maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause prosecuted the plaintiff because the best probable and reasonable cause would be that he honestly believed it. The jury returned a general verdict for the defendant.

Dec. 9, 1881. HAWKINS, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an action for a malicious prosecution. It was tried before my brother HUDDLESTON at Westminster on June 20 last. The verdict was for the defendant. Subsequently the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the following grounds —(i) that the learned baron misdirected the jury; and (ii) that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. This rule was argued before my brother HUDDLESTON and myself on Nov. 7, and I have now to deliver my judgment upon it.

C

The defendant was the landlord of a house in the Belgrave Road, St. John's Wood. The father of the plaintiff was tenant of that house. In February, 1879, an action which the defendant had brought in the county court against the plaintiff's father to recover rent alleged to be in arrear and to have accrued due after the month of December, 1877, came on to be tried before the county court judge. The defence set up, was, that before any of the rent became due, namely, on Dec. 17, 1877, there was a surrender of the tenancy, and that on that day, in completion of the surrender, and by way of giving up possession of the premises, the key of the house was delivered to and accepted by the defendant. To support this defence, the plaintiff was called as a witness for his father, and swore that he, on the last-mentioned day, at the request of the defendant, gave him up the key. Of the materiality of this statement there could be no doubt. After the determination of the county court action, the defendant indicted the plaintiff for perjury at the Central Criminal Court. On the trial of that indictment the plaintiff was acquitted. He then commenced this action for a malicious prosecution. On the trial before HUDDLESTON, B., the plaintiff repeated the evidence he had given at the county court. On the other hand, the defendant on his oath expressly denied the truth of the plaintiff's statement, and, in confirmation of his own testimony, referred to his diary and other corroborating circumstances, to which it is not necessary to allude more particularly than the result I have already stated.

I proceed now to deal with the motion for a new trial, and first with the alleged misdirection. In summing-up the case, the learned baron told the jury that if the plaintiff had satisfied them he was telling the truth that he really did give up the key, and the defendant, knowing he had done so, indicted him for perjury, the plaintiff would be entitled to their verdict. On the other hand, he told them that if they believed the statement on oath of the plaintiff was untrue, and that he made it knowing it to be so, the defendant was justified in the course he took. To neither of these propositions could any objection be made. The learned baron also told the jury that, if in substance they believed the plaintiff's version, their verdict ought to be for him, but that, if they thought the defendant was speaking the truth, he was entitled to their verdict. To this, too, most properly no objection was taken, for, although no doubt as an abstract proposition the plaintiff might have spoken the truth, still the defendant for reasonable cause might have believed him to be guilty. So on the other hand the defendant might have spoken the truth as to the key, and yet have had no reason to suppose the plaintiff's oath to the contrary was other than the result of innocent forgetfulness.

The learned baron's direction, however, must be construed, as the summing-up of a judge always ought to be, in connection with the particular circumstances of the case then before him. In the present case those circumstances were such that it was difficult to suppose either of the parties, in giving his evidence, could be labouring under any mistake. The learned baron, however, thought it right to provide for an alternative view of the case, viz., the event of an inability on the part of the jury to agree upon either of the questions so submitted to them. He accordingly told them that if they thought the matter was left in such doubt that they could not arrive at a conclusion as to which of the parties was speaking correctly, then they were left in this position—that the plaintiff had not made out his case to their satisfaction, and the defendant would be entitled to their verdict.

The learned baron then proceeded to present another alternative view to the jury, and told them that it might be they would come to the conclusion that the plaintiff did in fact deliver up the key as he swore, and that the defendant had a very treacherous memory and had forgotten all about it, and went on with the prosecution under the impression that he never had the key. Nevertheless, if that was an honest impression, the upshot of a fallacious memory, and acting upon it, he honestly believed the plaintiff had sworn falsely and corruptly, no jury would be justified in saying that the defendant maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause prosecuted the plaintiff, because the best probable and reasonable cause would be that he honestly believed it. With this direction the case was left to the jury, who returned a general verdict for the defendant.

Upon the points of misdirection, counsel for the plaintiff, confining his objections to the two latter alternatives, argued that as the verdict was a general one, and it was uncertain whether it was based upon the belief of the jury in the defendant's version or upon one of these alternatives, there ought, if either of his objections was sustained, to be a new trial. In this I think he was right; it becomes, therefore, necessary to consider these objections separately. The first was as to the learned baron telling the jury that if they were left in doubt, their verdict should be for the defendant. I think this direction is not open to exception. To succeed in an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must allege and establish two things—absence of reasonable and probable cause and malice. The affirmative of these allegations is upon him, failing to establish both of them he fails altogether. It is an essential element in his case that the jury should, under the judge's directions as to what facts will suffice for that purpose, find affirmatively the non-existence of probable cause, and they have no right to assume it without proof. If on the trial of such an action the plaintiff were to offer no other evidence than that the defendant caused him to be indicted even from the most vindictive motives the defendant would be entitled to a verdict: Mitchell v. Jenkins (1), 5 B. & Ad. at p. 594, per PARKE, J. In this respect the action for malicious prosecution does not differ from any other action in which the plaintiff is called upon to prove his case. If further authority upon this point were necessary it is to be found in the dictum of LORD COLONSAY in Lister v. Perryman (2) (L.R. 4 H.L. at p. 542). With regard to that dictum, however, I must observe that in uttering it the learned Lord must have been under the impression that the action under consideration was for a malicious prosecution, whereas it was for false imprisonment, there being this recognised distinction between the two actions, that in false imprisonment the onus lies upon the defendant to plead and prove affirmatively the existence of reasonable cause as his justification; whereas in an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must allege and prove affirmatively its non-existence.

With regard to the last alternative presented to the jury, counsel for the plaintiff contended as a general proposition that where a defendant relies upon his own memory for the facts which go to make up probable cause, he must prove to the satisfaction of the jury that his memory of the facts is accurate, and if he fails to do so he must be taken in law to have acted without that reasonable and probable cause which the facts, if true, would have established. In other words, he contended that giving a defendant full credit for honesty, if he relies upon his own memory for his justification, he must stand or fall by its accuracy. Applying this general proposition to the present case, he urged that the learned baron ought to have told the jury that if they believed the plaintiff did in fact deliver the key to the defendant, and the defendant unfortunately acted upon a fallacious memory, and in forgetfulness of the circumstance which once was clearly within his knowledge, and which forgotten circumstance would, if recollected, have established a clear want of reasonable and probable cause, his belief in the accuracy of his memory, and in the guilt of the plaintiff, however conscientious, would not afford him justification or excuse. In support of his argument he cited Turner v. Ambler (3), and, moreover, he informed us that DENMAN, J., and POLLOCK, B., had virtually

A so ruled. I do not assent to this proposition. I do not find in the case cited anything which favours it, and I have the best reason for saying that my brothers DENMAN and POLLOCK have been altogether misunderstood.

This brings me to the consideration of what is reasonable and probable cause. I should define reasonable and probable cause to be an honest belief in the guilt of the accused, based upon a full conviction, founded upon reasonable grounds, of the existence of a state of circumstances which, assuming them to be true, would reasonably lead any ordinarily prudent and cautious man, placed in the position of the accuser, to the conclusion that the person charged was probably guilty of the crime imputed. There must be first, an honest belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused; secondly, such belief must be based on an honest conviction of the existence of the circumstances which led the accuser to that conclusion; thirdly, such secondly mentioned belief must be based upon reasonable grounds—by this I mean such grounds as would lead any fairly cautious man in the defendant's situation so to believe; fourthly, the circumstances so believed and relied on by the accuser must be such as amount to reasonable ground for belief in the guilt of the accused.

The belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused, his belief in the existence of the facts on which he acted, and the reasonableness of such last-mentioned belief, are questions of fact for the jury, whose findings upon them become so many facts from which the judge is to draw the inference and determine whether they do or do not amount to reasonable and probable cause. This, also, is an inference of fact, not of law, as is sometimes erroneously supposed, and the judge is to draw it from all the circumstances of the case: see Lister v. Perryman (2), L.R. 4 H.L. at pp. 535, 538, per LORD CHELMSFORD and LORD WESTBURY. This inference is certainly not to be interfered with upon lighter grounds than if it had been entrusted by law to the jury. In practice everybody knows the judge may and often does anticipate the findings of the jury alternatively in his summing-up, as the learned baron did in this case. If in this case now under discussion the jury found their verdict for the defendant upon the last alternative presented to them by the learned baron, I think the undisputed circumstances were such that they must be taken to have found that in fact the plaintiff was not guilty, but that an honest and reasonable belief was entertained by the defendant to the contrary, and in the existence of facts which, if true, justified that conclusion. True it is that, according to the hypothesis involved in the last alternative, the defendant's belief in the one great fact mainly relied on by him, namely, that the key was not delivered to him by the plaintiff, must have been found by the jury to be erroneous, and the supposed fact to have had no real existence. It does not, however, follow that because the supposed fact had no real existence the belief was unreasonable. Yet this is what counsel for the plaintiff in substance contended.

Let us consider this for a minute or two. If a man has never seen reason to doubt, but on the contrary, has ever had reason to trust, the general accuracy of his memory, and that memory presents to him a vivid apparent recollection that a particular occurrence took place in his presence within a recent period of time, is it not reasonable to believe in the existence of it? The more especially if, as in the present case, his diary and other surrounding circumstances appear to confirm his memory. What more reasonable ground can be suggested for a belief that any particular act was done than the conviction of the person believing that he remembers it as having been done in his presence before his own eyes? Would it not, under such circumstances, be most unreasonable, if not impossible, to disbelieve? Counsel for the plaintiff admitted indeed it was impossible to dispute, for a long list of authorities, notably among them Lister v. Perryman (2), might be cited to establish the proposition that a person may reasonably institute a prosecution solely upon information given to him by another, and which he honestly believes to be true. What does this admission, coupled with his argument, amount to? That a prosecutor may trust, provided he knows no ground for distrust, the memory of another, but may not give credit to his own. I cannot recognise such a distinction, either in law or common sense, and no authority, as far as I know, can be found to warrant it. A

The question of reasonable and probable cause depends in all cases not upon the actual existence, but upon the reasonable bona fide belief in the existence of such a state of things as would amount to a justification of the course pursued in making the accusation complained of. No matter whether the belief arises out of the recollection and memory of the accuser, or out of information furnished to him by another. It is not essential in any case that facts should be established proper and fit and admissible as evidence to be submitted to the jury upon an issue as to the actual guilt of the accused. The distinction between facts necessary to establish actual guilt and those required to establish a reasonable bona fide belief in guilt should never be lost sight of in considering such cases as I am now discussing. Many facts admissible to prove the latter would be wholly inadmissible to prove the former. B C

It cannot of course be laid down as an abstract proposition that an accuser is justified in acting either upon the credited statement of an informant, or upon his own memory. The question must always arise according to circumstances whether it was reasonable to trust either the one or the other. A person who acts upon the information of another trusts the veracity, the memory and the accuracy of that other, in each of which he may be completely deceived; his informant's veracity may be questionable; his memory fallacious, and his accuracy unreliable. Yet it does not follow that it was unreasonable to believe in his information if he never had cause to doubt him. In like manner a man may be deceived by his own memory, yet it does not follow that it was unreasonable to trust it if he never before knew it to be defective. Why, I ask, if he may rely on the memory of another, may he not rely upon his own? The reasonableness or otherwise of this reliance, I have already said, it is for the jury to determine. If the informant were known by the accuser to be a person in whose veracity, memory, power of observation, and accuracy no confidence could be placed, no jury, I should think, would hesitate to find that a belief based solely upon information from such an informant was unreasonable; the same observation would apply if an accuser acted wholly upon the information of his own memory, knowing that it was untrustworthy. In short, it would be unreasonable to rely either on an informant known to be untrustworthy or a memory known to be unreliable without substantial confirmation especially when the liberty of another is concerned. I am of opinion then that there was no misdirection, and, this being so, the jury, under the learned baron's direction, must be taken to have found that absence of reasonable cause was not established, and the verdict was rightly entered for the defendant. D E F G

Under these circumstances it becomes unnecessary to consider the question of malice: Mitchell v. Jenkins (1), 5 B. & Ad. at p. 594, per PARKE, J. I cannot, however, refrain from referring to an argument of counsel for the plaintiff that, if the learned baron ought to have told the jury there was want of reasonable cause, that of itself was evidence of malice. I do not agree in this. It is true as a general proposition that want of probable cause is evidence of malice, but this general proposition is apt to be misunderstood. In an action of this description the question of malice is an independent one of fact purely and altogether for the consideration of the jury and not at all for the judge. The malice necessary to be established is not mere malice in law such as may be assumed from the intentional doing of a wrongful act: see Bromage v. Prosser (4), 4 B. & C. at p. 255, per BAYLEY, J.; but malice in fact, malus animus, indicating that the party was actuated either by spite or ill-will towards an individual or by indirect or improper motives, though these may be wholly unconnected with any uncharitable feeling towards anybody. In order to arrive at a conclusion upon this question, the jury are to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and to form their own opinion upon them, uninfluenced by any opinion of the judge, unless that opinion accords with their own view. If among these circumstances it appears to the jury that there was H I

- A no reasonable ground for the prosecution, they may, though by no means bound to do so, well think that it must have been dictated by some sinister motive on the part of the person who instituted it. Absence of reasonable cause to be evidence of malice must be absence of such cause in the opinion of the jury themselves, and I do not think they could be properly told to consider the opinion of the judge upon that point, if it differed from their own as it possibly might, and in some cases
- B probably would, as evidence for their consideration in determining whether there was malice or not. In no case, however, will their finding relieve the judge of the duty of determining for himself the question of reasonable cause. As an essential element of the case, want of reasonable cause is for the judge alone to determine upon the facts found for the jury. As evidence of malice, it is a question wholly for the jury, who, even if they should think there was want of probable cause,
- C might nevertheless think that the defendant acted honestly and without ill-will, or any other motive or desire than to do what he bona fide believed to be right, and purely in the interest of justice, in which case they ought not, in my opinion, to find the existence of malice: see Mitchell v. Jenkins (1); Turner v. Ambler (3), 10 Q.B. at p. 254; Lister v. Perryman (2), L.R. 4 H.L. at p. 538, per LORD WESTBURY.
- D It is an anomalous state of things that there may be two different and opposite findings in the same cause upon the question of probable cause, one by the jury, and another by the judge, but such at present is the law. With regard to that part of the rule which complains that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, my brother HUDDLESTON thinks the verdict was right. Having carefully considered the whole case, I am of the same opinion. This rule, therefore, fails
- E upon every point, and must be discharged.

The plaintiff appealed.

- Grantham, Q.C.* (with him Agabeg) for the plaintiff.—Believing a thing erroneously, honestly forgetting it, trusting to a treacherous memory, is not reasonable and probable cause. [LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is necessary for the plaintiff to show not only that there was no reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution,
- F but also that there was malice.]

McLeod for the defendant, was not called on to argue.

- LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—It appears to me that there was no evidence in this case to justify a finding of malice on the part of the defendant; and if the jury were told, as they were told, that if they thought that the defendant, acting upon
- G an honest impression, the upshot of a fallacious memory, honestly believed that the plaintiff had sworn falsely, they ought not to say that the defendant maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause prosecuted the plaintiff, it appears to me that the direction of the learned baron was perfectly correct.

- BRETT, L.J.—The only question here is: Was there a misdirection? The judge told the jury that if they thought that the plaintiff did in fact deliver up the key as he swore, but that the defendant had a very treacherous memory and had forgotten all about it, and went on with the prosecution under the honest impression that he never had the key, they ought to find for the defendant. The whole question really was, whether there was malice or not; and the jury could not find that there was malice in fact, if the defendant really believed his version of the story to be the true one. I therefore think that there was no misdirection.
- I

HOLKER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

ROSE v. ROSE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ.), March 12, 1883]

[Reported 8 P.D. 98; 52 L.J.P. 25; 48 L.T. 378; 31 W.R. 573]

Divorce—Condonation—Covenant in separation agreement not to rely on matrimonial offences committed before date of deed.

Under the terms of a deed of separation a wife was granted custody of the child of the marriage and was to retain all the household furniture. The husband undertook to pay certain sums of money to trustees on the wife's behalf, the covenants by him being expressed to be in consideration of the wife observing the covenants set out in the deed. The last covenant in the deed provided that any cause of complaint "which now exists or has arisen" between the parties should be forgiven and deemed to have been condoned, that neither party should subsequently commence proceedings in respect of the same, and that, if proceedings were subsequently initiated, evidence as to these causes of complaint was not to be admissible. Subsequently, the wife brought a suit for the dissolution of the marriage on the grounds of her husband's cruelty committed before the execution of the deed and his adultery since the execution of the deed.

Held: the wife could not revive the cruelty committed before the execution of the deed since she had made a final and binding bargain, which was contained in a deed under which she took certain benefits, not to take any proceedings against her husband in respect of any of his past misconduct.

Per SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.: There is nothing in public policy . . . opposed to final condonation, and there is no statute or common law against it.

Notes. Section 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1963, now provides that adultery which has been condoned shall not be capable of being revived.

Appeal from an order of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., reported 7 P.D. 225, granting a decree of judicial separation on a petition by a wife, Agnes Rose, for the dissolution of her marriage on the grounds of her husband's, Henry Rose's, cruelty and adultery.

The parties were married on July 2, 1860, and there was one child of the marriage who was born on Oct. 18, 1869. On April 6, 1877, the parties executed a separation deed, under which the wife retained as her separate property all the furniture, etc.

A in the house in which she then resided, and all future acquired property. The deed provided that the husband, in consideration of his wife

B "faithfully keeping, performing, and observing the covenants and stipulations herein contained to be kept and performed and observed by her, shall and will pay unto [a trustee] at or before the execution hereof, the sum of £25 . . . and shall and will on Oct. 7, 1877, pay unto the [trustee] a further sum of £95 . . . such moneys to be held by her in trust for and on behalf of the said Agnes Rose, and to be used and applied by her for and towards the support and maintenance of the said Agnes Rose, and to assist her in gaining a livelihood as a lodging-house keeper, and in full discharge of all claims by the said Agnes Rose against the said Henry Rose for maintenance and support."

C The wife was to have the custody of the child; and was out of the provision made for her by the deed "or otherwise" to maintain herself and the child. The last clause of the deed was in the following terms:

D "No proceedings shall be commenced or prosecuted by or on behalf of either party against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which now exists, or has arisen before the date of these presents, and every offence (if any) which has been committed or permitted by either party against the other shall be considered, as the same is, hereby forgiven and condoned; and, in case hereafter either shall commence or prosecute any proceedings against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which may hereafter arise, no offence or misconduct, which has been committed or permitted before the execution of these presents, and no act, deed, neglect, or default of either party in relation to any such offence or misconduct shall be pleaded or alleged by either party E or be admissible in evidence."

F The learned judge found that cruelty prior to the execution of the deed and adultery subsequent to the deed had both been proved, but that there had been no cruelty since the date of the deed. In these circumstances HIS LORDSHIP, following Gandy v. Gandy (3) held that the adultery did not revive the acts of cruelty committed before the separation deed and therefore only granted the wife a decree of judicial separation with costs.

Dr. Tristram and W. T. Barnard, jun., for the wife.

C. A. Middleton for the husband.

G SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—As I have already pointed out in Besant v. Wood (1), unless married women were allowed to contract themselves out of their strict rights every suit in the Divorce Court would have to be fought out to the end. It is impossible to suppose that if the legislature has given a married woman the right to sue, she has not also the right to contract not to sue. The House of Lords in Rowley v. Rowley (2) enforced an undertaking not to institute proceedings, holding that proceedings were not to be instituted for anything up to the time of the undertaking. That is logical enough. That being so, there is in this case a contract for value not to sue in respect of the previous misconduct. That contract H appears to me to be perfectly valid, not only as not being in any way inconsistent with public policy, but as being one of the incidents of the right of suit. It is not inconsistent with the Act of Parliament that the woman shall have the right of finally condoning matrimonial offences. I am afraid that a good deal of the monkish I doctrine of the ecclesiastical courts has been transferred to the new court constituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [repealed]. One of those doctrines was that condonation of matrimonial misconduct never was final, but that the condoned offence was always liable to be revived by subsequent misconduct. There is nothing in public policy, so far as I understand it, opposed to final condonation; and there is no statute or common law against it. It is just as desirable in domestic, as in other transactions that by-gones should be treated as by-gones.

In the present case the wife made a final and binding bargain, which was contained in a deed under which she took certain benefits, not to take any proceedings against her husband in respect of any of his past misconduct. Now she says: "I will take those benefits under the deed and repudiate that part of the agreement which I am to perform." I am of opinion that she cannot be allowed to do that. She cannot revive the charges of cruelty committed before the separation deed, so as, by combining these charges with the husband's subsequent adultery, to obtain a dissolution of marriage. The learned President of the Divorce Division was, in my opinion, quite right in refusing to make a decree for dissolution of marriage. It has been contended that if the previous misconduct had been adultery, instead of cruelty, the case could not have been decided in this way, and that adultery, as distinguished from cruelty, could never have been finally condoned. That is not, in my opinion, the true meaning of the Act of Parliament, and if the question ever arises the Court of Appeal may have an opportunity of deciding the point.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The husband in this case committed adultery since the execution of a separation deed executed by his wife and himself. In respect of that adultery the wife was entitled to a decree for judicial separation, and such a decree has been made by the President of the Divorce Division. The object of this appeal, which is brought by the wife, is to obtain a decree for dissolution of marriage. There has been no cruelty on the part of the husband since the separation deed, but there was before. As to previous misconduct, however, the deed provides that no proceedings are to be commenced by either party, but that every such previous offence is to be considered as condoned. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to hold that the whole deed, or the whole of the clause which I have referred to, is absolutely void, that clause is a bar to the right which she would otherwise have of relying on the previous cruelty. If the deed had been obtained in an improper manner, then, no doubt, the clause would not be allowed to stand in the wife's way to obtaining a dissolution of marriage, but such a case is not set up in the pleadings, and no circumstances to impeach it have been shown. It is suggested, however, that the very terms of the deed show that it is contrary to public policy. I do not agree with that suggestion. Deeds couched in quite as strong language have been upheld in the highest courts, and in my opinion there is nothing in this deed which is invalid. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I, also, am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed. The question appears to me to be, Is the deed good for anything or not? It is too late now to say that such a clause as the one which has been referred to so many times is contrary to public policy. The authorities were carefully examined in Besant v. Wood (1) and the result was that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., came to the conclusion that the wife had a right to compromise suits, not only after the commencement of litigation, but after the quarrel, and before proceedings had actually commenced—in other words, that after much controversy a separation deed must be considered just as binding on the wife as on the husband. Then followed Gandy v. Gandy (3), in which the same principle was adopted by the Court of Appeal. The present case indeed appears to be on all fours with Gandy v. Gandy (3). Counsel for the wife has argued that the clause is against public policy. In my opinion, a clause in a separation deed releasing a person from liability as to past misconduct is not against public policy. I think the deed was not condonation at all, but a contract between the parties.

Appeal dismissed without costs.

SANDERS AND ANOTHER v. SANDERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Baggallay and Lush, L.JJ.), November 29, 1881]

Limitation of Action—Recovery of land—Tenancy in common—Rents received by one tenant for more than twenty years—Payments of moiety made after 21 years—Presumption that payments made previously.

In 1833 A and B became tenants in common of certain property in fee simple. A took possession and he and his successors at all times received the whole of the rent. From November, 1864, to November, 1877, one half of the rent was paid to solicitors acting for B and a mortgagee of his share. The payments then ceased. After B's death, his successor and the mortgagee brought an action against A's successor for sale or partition. The statement of claim originally did not allege any payment by A before 1864, and the defence was that A had acquired a title by limitation, having received the whole of the rent for upwards of 20 years without accounting for B's share. The statement of claim was amended to allege payments by A on account of B's share throughout the period before 1864. The amended defence did not admit those payments. The parties made admissions which, however, were silent as to any payments before 1864 and neither side called any evidence on the point.

Held: if A had in fact not accounted for B's share of the rent between 1833 and 1864, B's title would have been extinguished and would not have been revived by the subsequent payments, but the admission as to these payments raised a presumption that payments had also been made before 1864, and, there being nothing to negative that, the defence was not established.

Court of Appeal—Evidence—Fresh evidence—Admission—"Special grounds"—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 5.

The defendant applied for leave to call further evidence under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 5, on the ground that he had taken the admission to raise the contrary presumption.

Held: the wrong construction of the admissions was not a special ground for the exercise of the court's discretion under the rule.

Notes. The Limitation Act, 1939, s. 25, replaced Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 7 (repealed by s. 34 (4) and Sched. to Act of 1939) which replaced Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 28. Section 34 of the Act of 1833 was replaced by s. 16 of the Act of 1939 and repealed by s. 34 (4) and Sched. to Act of 1939. By R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 9 (2), the Court of Appeal has full discretionary power to receive further evidence on questions of fact.

Appeal from a decision of MALINS, V.-C.

By his will dated Oct. 27, 1813, Thomas Sanders devised certain hereditaments to his wife, Anne Sanders, for her life, with remainder to his sons, Thomas Sanders and John Sanders, in equal shares as tenants in common. The testator died shortly afterwards and his widow died in 1833. Thomas Sanders, the son, died on July 29, 1877, leaving his son, the defendant, his heir-at-law. John Sanders, who mortgaged his share in 1864 to the plaintiff, Elizabeth Weatherill, died in April, 1878, having devised his share to his son, the plaintiff Sanders.

The following facts were stated in admissions: On the death of Anne Sanders, Thomas Sanders the son, through whom the defendant claimed title, entered into receipt of the whole of the rents and profits of the entirety of the hereditaments and premises and from and after the decease of Anne Sanders and down to his death continued in such receipt. As from November, 1864, Thomas Sanders the son paid to the plaintiffs' solicitors for their use a moiety of the rents of the hereditaments and premises, due in that month, and he continued to pay to the solicitors for the use of the plaintiffs a moiety of the rents until the time of his death.

Thomas Sanders the son died on July 29, 1877. The defendant was his eldest son and heir-at-law, and the defendant, upon his said father's death, entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the entirety of the hereditaments and premises. After the death of Thomas Sanders, the son, the defendant paid the plaintiffs' solicitors extra rent received by Thomas Sanders, the son, up to May, 1877, from the tenant of part of the property and not accounted for by him. He also paid the plaintiffs' solicitors an occupation rent in respect of a moiety of another part of the property occupied by himself up to November, 1877, and a moiety of a year's rent received by him from one Starling, a tenant of part of the property, to November, 1877, and a moiety of a half year's rent due from one Agar, another tenant, to May, 1877. In 1865 Thomas Sanders the son wrote a letter to John Sanders and his mortgagee acknowledging their title to a moiety. After November, 1878, the defendant Sanders received the whole of the rents and profits of the said hereditaments without accounting to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs brought an action for sale or partition. The defendant having raised the defence of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, the statement of claim was amended by adding a prayer for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled as tenants in common with the defendant to one undivided moiety of the hereditaments devised by the will of the testator. MALINS, V.-C., decided that although there had then been twenty years' possession, the acknowledgment of 1865 was sufficient to take the case out of the statute. The defendant appealed.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—The decision of MALINS, V.-C., seems to have some authority in support of it, though there is also authority against it. I must express my dissent from so much of that authority as affirms the proposition of law contained in the judgment of the court below. This holding does not affect the question as to the acknowledgment being evidence of a payment having been made before the end of the twenty years. I am convinced, however, that such acknowledgment will not re-vest a title fully established in another person.

In Stansfeld v. Hobson (1) the point was not noticed in the judgment of either of the lords justices who decided that case, although it was mentioned in the argument which took place before them. They were judges who would not evade such a question, and the only conclusion to which I can come is that the point was overlooked. That being so, I cannot treat that case as an authority that an

- A acknowledgment after the title has once gone can re-vest that title in the former owner. In Re Alison (2) the Court of Appeal arrived at an opposite decision, but in justice to the Vice-Chancellor I ought to say that that case was not cited before him. This appeal is brought for that reason, and if there was nothing else the defendant would be entitled to succeed on the present appeal; but the appeal is not against the reasons of the decision, but against the decision itself.
- B The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor can be supported on other grounds. The case came on to be heard on admissions, and the defendant's counsel thought that he should succeed in the absence of any evidence of an actual payment within the twenty years during which his client's predecessors in title had been in possession of the entirety of the property after the widow's death. It appears that, after holding possession of the entirety of the property for more than twenty years, the defendant and his predecessors in title for more than thirteen years continued the payment of the rents and profits to the owners of the other moiety. The plaintiff thought that, even if no payment was made in the twenty years, he would be entitled to succeed by reason of the acknowledgment given after that period had expired. He was about to adduce evidence of payment before 1864. The Vice-Chancellor, however, decided the case in his favour on the point of law, and the defendant did not tender any evidence to show that there was no payment before 1864. He relied on the judgment given on the question of law by the Vice-Chancellor being erroneous, and concluded that the effect of the admissions was sufficient evidence of no payment before the completion of his title. He cannot be said to have been in any way surprised. He chose to conduct his own case without putting in any evidence.
- E The evidence afforded by the admissions is very plain as to payment, and, therefore, there is nothing from which the court could infer that the defendant's predecessor had acquired an indefeasible title by undisturbed possession for the statutory period. The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, is thus out of the case altogether. There is nothing whatever to show the extinguishment of the title to the other moiety. The defendant's counsel, probably when they saw how the appeal would be decided, asked leave to bring fresh evidence. I think that application must be refused. In the first place it is an application for indulgence. The defendant did not conduct his case as he might have done, and probably would have done if he could have foreseen what would happen. But that is no ground for the application. It is extremely dangerous, after trial, to allow fresh evidence to be brought. Nothing seems to be more likely to lead to perjury than allowing such fresh evidence. The exact point on which the court requires to be satisfied is known, and, if evidence is allowed to be given on the point, there is a great temptation to invent the facts required. Nothing, in my opinion, is more likely to prejudice the interests of truth and justice. Sometimes we consider what I may call moral merits.
- G It appears that this defendant's father entered into possession, and that from November, 1864, to July, 1877, a period of nearly thirteen years, he accounted for the rents of one moiety to the person with whom he held in common. The defendant asks now to be allowed to bring evidence that no rent was paid during the previous twenty years. I should think it would be almost impossible by any evidence to convince a jury that during the twenty years no rent had been paid. Assuming that one brother had possession of the whole for twenty years, is that a case for allowing the indulgence now asked? If we have any discretion in a case like this we ought, in my opinion, to exercise it against the person making such an application.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—This action is brought by one of two tenants in common against the other for sale or partition of the property held in common. The defence set up is, that the right of the plaintiff's predecessor in title first accrued on the death of the testator's widow in 1833, and that the defendant's predecessor held the whole for twenty years without accounting for any part of the rents and profits

The plaintiff sets up in answer to that a claim by reason of the acknowledgment of his predecessor's title after the expiration of the twenty years. The Vice-Chancellor decided in favour of the plaintiff. I agree with his decision, but I cannot agree with the grounds on which he based it. The Vice-Chancellor has held that where there has been possession without accounting for twenty years a subsequent acknowledgment in writing is sufficient to exclude the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and, as an authority for this proposition, he relies on Stansfield v. Hobson (1). According to the marginal notes of the reports of that case, it is an authority for the Vice-Chancellor's decision. But, when we look at the judgments of the two lords justices, it is clear that the only point actually decided by them was whether the document in that case was itself a sufficient acknowledgment, independently of the time of its being given, of the title of the mortgagor or of his right to redeem, to satisfy s. 28 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. However, the Vice-Chancellor thought that the case was in point and binding upon him; and he followed what he thought was the decision of the lords justices. I am unable to adopt the view that the case is in point.

It was not established in Stansfield v. Hobson (1) that an acknowledgment from a mortgagee after he had been twenty years in possession was sufficient to take the case out of the statute. The point was, however, argued in Re Alison (2), and in that case it was held that the right of the mortgagee was fully established by the twenty years' possession, notwithstanding an acknowledgment given after that time had elapsed. I am unable to agree with the grounds of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment. The grounds on which the case must be decided are that the facts are on the written admissions, and that there is nothing on the face of the admissions to show that, during the possession of the defendant's predecessor in title, there had been no accounting to the owner of the other half share for the rents and profits of that share.

Applying the rule as to presumption of payments to the facts stated in the admissions, I should think that there had been accounting for rents and profits during that period. Counsel for the defendant asks to be allowed to bring additional evidence to show that the admissions are not correct, and he relies upon R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 58, r. 5 [now R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 9 (2)]. No doubt the court has full discretionary power to order such evidence to be admitted if it thinks that special grounds for allowing such fresh evidence have been shown. What special grounds are there for acceding to the application? That those who advised the plaintiff put a special construction on those admissions which is not a right construction to put upon them. That is no sufficient ground, and I think that the application should be refused, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

LUSH, L.J.—If it is proved that for more than twenty years before accounting no payment was made at all, any payment made after the expiration of that would not have given a title. If there has been possession for twenty years without paying or accounting for the rents and profits, a new title in the claimant is created by the statute. No evidence has been given that the rents and profits were not accounted for from 1833 to 1864. It is said that we may infer from the admissions that there was no accounting for the rents and profits of a moiety. I cannot agree to that. The admissions state that upon the death of the widow Thomas Sanders the son entered into receipt of the rents and profits and continued in such receipt down to the time of his death. What does that say more than that one tenant got into possession of the entire estate? It does not say that possession was not given and kept on the footing of the person taking possession accounting. [His LORDSHIP read the rest of the admissions, and continued:] To my mind it is not only consistent with the admitted facts that payment of half of the rents and profits may have been continued, but, as an inference of fact, it is not at all likely that a man who had got an estate himself by an adverse title would continue payment of rents to the brother whom he had excluded by such adverse possession. It is not likely

A that a man would willingly create a title against himself. The reasonable inference of fact to be drawn is, that payments of rent were made continuously during and after the time when title by adverse possession is said to have been gained, and that such payments only changed hands in 1864.

HOWE AND ANOTHER v. SMITH

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cotton, Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), March 31, April 1, May 29, 1884]

[Reported 27 Ch.D. 89; 53 L.J.Ch. 1055; 50 L.T. 573; 48 J.P. 773; 32 W.R. 802]

Sale of Land—Contract—Breach—Deposit—Recovery—Repudiation of contract by purchaser—Deposit paid “as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money.”

A deposit, paid by the purchaser to the vendor in accordance with the terms of a contract for the sale of land, is, in the absence of some contrary provision in the contract, according to the ordinary interpretation by business men, a security for the completion of the contract, and where the conduct of the purchaser is such as to amount to repudiation of the contract and he has lost all right to specific performance of the contract in equity and to damages for its non-performance in law, he is not entitled to recover the deposit from the vendor. This is so where the deposit is “paid as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money.”

G

A. contracted to sell real estate to B. for £12,500, “£500, part thereof, having been paid, on the signing of this agreement, as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money.” The balance of the purchase money was to be paid on April 24, and the contract provided that if the purchaser “shall fail to comply with this agreement the vendor shall be at liberty to re-sell the premises in any manner, and the deficiency on such second sale thereof, with all expenses attending the same, shall be made good by the defaulter at this present sale, and be recoverable as liquidated damages.” There was no provision as to what was to be done with the deposit in case of a re-sale. The purchaser was guilty of such delay in completion as in the opinion of the court amounted to a repudiation of the contract, and the vendor re-sold for an amount equal to the original price.

Held: the purchaser was not entitled to recover the deposit.

PER FRY, L.J.: Where the vendor has a power to re-sell in case of default and the purchaser is to pay the deficiency, and the purchaser has been guilty of such default as justifies the vendor in treating the contract as rescinded, this affords the vendor an alternative remedy, so that he may either affirm the contract and re-sell under it, or rescind the contract and sell under his absolute title. If he acts under the contract he must bring the deposit into account in his claim for the deficiency; if he sells as owner he may retain the deposit, but loses his claim for the deficiency.

Appeal from a decision of KAY, J., in an action for specific performance.

By an agreement, dated Mar. 24, 1881, and made between the defendant, George Hindes Smith, of the one part, and Thomas Heslop Howe, one of the plaintiffs, of the other part, the defendant agreed to sell and T. H. Howe agreed to purchase, "for the price or sum of £12,500, £500. part thereof, having been paid on the signing of this agreement, as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money."

A certain freehold pieces of land, free from encumbrances. The balance of the purchase money was to be paid on April 24, 1881, when the purchase was to be completed, the rents and outgoings up to that time being received and paid by the vendors. In case of delay from any cause, except the default of the vendor, the purchaser was to pay interest at 5 per cent. from that day till actual completion. Clause 8 was as follows :

B "If the purchaser shall fail to comply with this agreement the vendor shall be at liberty to re-sell the premises in any manner, and the deficiency on such second sale thereof, with all expenses attending the same, shall be made good by the defaulter at this present sale, and be recoverable as liquidated damages. This stipulation shall not prejudice the right of the vendor to a specific performance of this contract, nor shall he be bound to tender a conveyance to the purchaser."

C By a letter written at the same time, the vendor's solicitor agreed that the clause as to re-sale should not be put in force till the lapse of six weeks from April 24. On April 24 the purchaser had not sent the draft conveyance to the vendor's solicitor. The latter pressed for completion, and on June 20 it was agreed that the purchaser should have a month's further time to complete the contract on his paying certain costs. The contract was not completed, and the vendor afterwards declined to complete on the ground of the purchaser's delay. T. H. Howe, having sold his interest in the purchase to N. E. Howe, T. H. Howe and N. E. Howe on July 25, 1881, commenced an action against the vendor for specific performance of the agreement, and an injunction to restrain him from selling or conveying the property to any persons other than the plaintiffs. About six months afterwards the vendor re-sold the property at the original price. KAY, J., dismissed the action with costs on the ground of the purchaser's delay, and the plaintiffs appealed.

E After the arguments as to the right of the plaintiffs to specific performance, the court allowed the plaintiffs to raise a claim for the return of the deposit.

F W. Pearson, Q.C., and C. Batten for the plaintiffs.
Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Kingdon for the defendant.

At the conclusion of the arguments the court delivered judgment affirming the decision of KAY, J., that the plaintiffs were not entitled to specific performance, but reserved judgment on the question whether they were entitled to the return of the deposit.

G May 29, 1884. The following judgments were read.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an action brought by a purchaser and his sub-purchaser for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase and sale of land. At the hearing of the action, KAY, J., decided the only point raised by the plaintiffs, by the pleadings, viz., that in consequence of the delay the plaintiffs were not entitled to the equitable remedy of specific performance, which is only granted to those who are ready and prompt, and on appeal we affirmed this decision.

H But at the hearing of the appeal counsel for the plaintiffs asked liberty to raise a claim to the return of the deposit, the deposit being £500, which claim had not been raised in the court below, and we gave the leave, and considered the necessary amendments as having been made. The claim for this return of the deposit of I £500 is a claim which generally arises at common law. It has also arisen in bankruptcy, but in equity it has not arisen except with reference to sales under the jurisdiction of the court, and that accounts for the little authority there is on the point. The first thing we must look at is the contract. The contract contains no clause at all as to what is to be done with the deposit if the contract is not performed. It states that £500, part of the purchase money of £12,500, has been paid as a deposit, and in part payment of the purchase money. There was nothing else which was material except cl. 8, which was relied on (having regard to a case which I shall refer to) as giving the plaintiff the right to the return of the deposit.

It was contended that, having regard to Palmer v. Temple (1), this clause had fixed what was to be the penalty imposed on the purchaser if he made default—that this was to be the only liability in the case of default, and, therefore, that the deposit must be returned to the purchaser, the person who made default, of course subject to any claim which there might be to have any sum deducted under the sale. That case did, no doubt, lay down that, under that contract, the parties had settled what was to be the result of a default, but that was on a somewhat different provision from the claim in this case. It was under a proviso which laid down that, if either vendor or purchaser made default, then a sum of £1,000 should be paid as liquidated damages. It may be that that induced the court to come to the decision which they arrived at in that case—that that prevented the vendor, on the default of the purchaser, from retaining the deposit in consequence of the default of the purchaser. That case turned on the express terms of that proviso, which is different from the proviso in this case. If so, of course it is no authority here; but if that case does lay down (which I do not think it could have done), that such a clause, however varied in terms, would prevent the vendor, on the default of the purchaser, from retaining the deposit, I cannot agree with it, and do not feel bound to follow it.

In my opinion, this is a clause which merely fixes the amount which the vendor is to be entitled to if he follows the course which is there pointed out. It fixes the amount which he is to claim in that event; but, in my opinion, if the vendor had, irrespective of that clause, a right to retain the deposit under the circumstances existing in the present case, this clause would not give the purchaser the right to recover the deposit. The mere fact that there has been a re-sale, even if it were under this clause, which is in dispute, can, in my opinion, make no difference if the purchaser has made such a default as precludes him from demanding the transfer of the estate. That being so, when the vendor re-sold the estate he was only selling that which the purchaser had no possible right to demand, and his doing so cannot, in my opinion, affect the rights of the vendor and purchaser to the deposit.

But there is something more than that. In that case, undoubtedly, the judges did say that, independently of contract, the vendor cannot, on the default of the purchaser, retain the deposit; and there are similar expressions in other cases to that effect. There is a similar expression of opinion in Hinton v. Sparkes (2), and I think there are similar expressions of opinion in other cases at common law. But that, as I understand SUGDEN (LORD ST. LEONARDS), in his book on VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (14th Edn.), p. 40, is not in accordance with his view, for what he says is this:

“Where a purchaser is in default, and the seller has not parted with the subject of the contract, it is clear that the purchaser could not recover the deposit; for he cannot, by his own default, acquire a right to rescind the contract.”

Then he goes on to state his opinion that the mere re-sale of the estate after the purchaser's default cannot in any way affect the right of the deposittee to retain the deposit. Then we have Collins v. Stimson (3). There POLLOCK, B., refused to order the return of the deposit under circumstances somewhat different from these. What he says is this (as reported at 11 Q.B.D. at pp. 143, 144):

“According to the law of vendor and purchaser, the inference is that such a deposit is paid as a guarantee for the performance of the contract, and where the contract goes off by default of the purchaser, the vendor is entitled to retain the deposit.”

That was the grand principle of his decision.

But the matter does not quite stop there. There is a decision under somewhat different circumstances from the present case in Depree v. Bedborough (4), where there was a purchase under a sale by decree of the court. I will not refer to that case further than by saying that it is in accordance with a subsequent decision of

A the Court of Appeal in Re Parnell, Ex parte Barrell (5). There the purchaser had become bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy had disclaimed the contract under which he sought to recover the deposit. That was refused. JAMES, L.J., says (10 Ch. App. at p. 514):

B "The trustee in this case has no legal or equitable right to recover the deposit. The money was paid to the vendor as a guarantee that the contract should be performed. The trustee refuses to perform the contract, and then says, 'Give me back the deposit.' There is no ground for such a claim."

There is a variance, no doubt, in the expressions of opinion, if not in the decisions, with reference to the return of the deposit; but I think that the judgment of JAMES, L.J., gives us the principle on which we should deal with the case.

C What is the deposit? It is in the contract described as a deposit and a part payment of the purchase money. The deposit, as I understand it, and using the words of JAMES, L.J., is a guarantee that the contract shall be performed. If the sale goes on, of course not only in accordance with the words of the contract, but in accordance with the intention of the parties in making the contract, the deposit goes in part payment of the purchase money for which it is deposited; but if, on the default of the purchaser, the contract goes off—that is to say, if he repudiates the contract—then, according to JAMES, L.J., neither he, nor those claiming through him, can have any right to recover the deposit. It may not be that in all cases where this court would refuse specific performance the vendor ought to be entitled to retain the deposit. It may well be that there may be circumstances which would justify this court in declining, and require the court, according to its ordinary rules, to refuse, specific performance, in which it could not be said that the purchaser had repudiated the contract, or that he had entirely put an end to it so as to enable the vendor to retain the deposit. In my opinion, in order to enable the vendor so to act, there must be those acts on the part of the purchaser which not only amount to such delay as to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance, but which make his conduct amount to a repudiation on his part of the contract. In those circumstances, in my opinion, the rule is correctly laid down in the judgment of JAMES, L.J.—of course the case there was stronger than that which we have now to deal with—where the representative of the purchaser had neither in law nor in equity the right to the return of the deposit.

E What are the facts here? The contract was to be performed, according to the arrangement, on April 24. It is not necessary now to enter into the question of how far time would be considered as of the essence of the contract, because, since the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, when the question whether time is of the essence of the contract arises, all contracts must be governed by the rules of the courts of equity concerning that subject. What took place was this. Not only was the contract not performed on that day, but there was a delay from time to time, the purchaser asking for, and at one time, under hard terms of payment of costs, obtaining an extension of the time. He obtained further time, knowing that the vendor considered it of importance, as it was of importance, that the contract should be performed, if not to the very day, at least within a reasonable time. It was not performed within a reasonable time, and from the conduct of the purchaser, as I read the letters and understand what took place, I come to the conclusion that he never was, up to or even at the time when he brought this action, ready with the money to perform the contract. He was not ready with the money in order to purchase the estate, and, at the time when the action was commenced, if the vendor had said: "Where is your money; produce it, and then I will make the conveyance," he would not have produced the money, nor would the person to whom he sold that contract. In my opinion, without at all laying down that wherever the court refuses specific performance it will allow the vendor to retain the deposit, in this case the purchaser has so acted as to repudiate, on his part, the contract, and he cannot, under those circumstances, take advantage of his own default to recover this deposit from the vendor. Therefore, on this point A also, the appeal fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The purchaser in this case had no right, according to our decision pronounced on a previous day, to insist on the specific performance of the contract for the sale of the property. But it was urged at the last moment by his counsel that, at all events in the alternative, he must be entitled to the return of his deposit money. Treating the pleadings as amended for that purpose, we agreed to consider that alternative claim as if it had been raised on the pleadings in the way in which, whatever may have been the practice before the Judicature Act, I myself can see no reason why it should not be raised now. B

We have, therefore, to consider whether, under the circumstances of this case, the purchaser has lost his right to the return of this deposit money. The question as to the right of the purchaser to the return of the deposit money must, in each case, be a question, to my mind, of the conditions of the contract. In principle it ought to be so, because, of course, persons may make exactly what bargain they please as to what is to be done with the money deposited with one of the parties, or, where one of the parties is stakeholder, to abide the decision of the question with regard to the contract. The parties may make what bargain they please, and we have to look to the documents to see what bargain was made. If any authority were wanted—I do not think it is—for that, which is a question of construction, it would be found in Palmer v. Temple (1), one of the cases to which COTTON, L.J., has referred, and which, whatever may be the value of the case as an authority on the construction of the contract in the case—as to which I agree with everything that has fallen from COTTON, L.J.—does not seem to me to be at variance with the principle that in each case we must consider what was the bargain. C D E

In that case it was said (9 Ad. & El. at p. 520):

“The ground on which we rest this opinion is, that, in the absence of any specific provision, the question whether the deposit is forfeited depends on the intent of the parties, to be collected from the whole instrument.” F

In the present case we have, in the first place, turning to the language of the instrument, a description of the manner in which the money is staked or deposited. It is a deposit and it is to be both a deposit, and in the nature of part payment. and there is, further, a special covenant to which one ought to look to see whether any light is thrown on the language of the special covenant that the money is paid over as a deposit. Passing for a moment the special covenant, which I think does not really deprive the deposit in this case of the character which it would bear if there was no special covenant contained in the contract, that covenant in the contract for the sale merely fixes the amount which the vendor is to receive in the event of his insisting on his rights under the special covenant. and it seems to me that we have to consider what in ordinary parlance, and as used in an ordinary contract of sale, is the meaning which business persons would attach to the term “deposit.” G H

Without going at length into the history, and accepting all that has been said and will be said in this court on that point, shortly it comes to this, that a deposit, if nothing more is said about it, is, according to the ordinary interpretation by business men a security for the completion of the purchase. But, in what sense is it a security for the completion of the purchase? It is quite certain the purchaser cannot insist on abandoning his contract, and yet recover the deposit, because that would be to enable him to take advantage of his own wrong. Counsel for the present purchaser says the rule is different when the purchaser insists, not on abandoning his contract, but, on the contrary, is desirous at the moment he appears before the court of completing it, and, therefore, neither the principle nor the decision applies—that this is not a case where the purchaser is receding from the contract, but, on the contrary, that he is seeking to enforce it. It seems to me I

A the answer to that argument is that, although in terms in a case like the present the purchaser may appear to be insisting on his contract, in reality he has so conducted himself under it as to have refused, and has given the other side the right to say that he has refused performance. He may look as if he wished to perform, but in reality he has put it out of his power to do so—he has fallen from his contract.

B In every case, at law, it seems to me the question whether time is of the essence of the contract must depend, just as the question of the deposit must depend, on the contract itself. It is not necessary, in the present instance, to consider whether, under this special contract, time was of the essence of the contract or not, because the Judicature Act has placed the matter, as regards such propositions, on the footing on which it would have been treated in equity before the Judicature Act. But it is obvious that the party may lose his right to insist on a specific performance before an equitable tribunal without at the same time having necessarily so acted as to justify the other side in saying the contract is altogether at an end. As I understand, speaking with a due consciousness of my own ignorance on the point, all the court of equity does when it refuses specific performance on the ground of lapse of time, is to leave the parties to their remedy at law. It D refuses it because it would be unfair that the relief should be given. It does not follow, as a matter of law, on principle, that, because specific performance is refused, therefore the whole contract is at an end in law. We have to look to the conduct of the parties and to the contract itself, and put the two things together to see whether the purchaser has acted, not merely so as to break his contract, but to entitle the other side to say he has repudiated and no longer stands by it. It E applies the principle of the decision no more than is necessary to show that there must be a special or a reasonable performance which entitles him to deny the repudiation of the contract.

F Looking to see whether the conduct of the purchaser has not in the present instance brought him within that definition, I think it is impossible, reviewing the case from first to last, to doubt that he has so dealt with his bargain as to give the vendor a right to allege, if he chooses, that the contract is at an end, and the purchaser has receded from the bargain, and that it is just that the vendor should say that the purchaser has receded from the bargain. For the purposes of the case the purchaser has receded from the bargain, and the deposit money is liable to be retained by the vendor. Therefore, in my opinion, the appeal fails.

G FRY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question then arises, which has been argued before us, although not before KAY, J., whether or not the purchaser is entitled to recover the £500 paid on the signing of the contract. The £500 was paid, in the words of the contract, as “a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money.” What is the meaning of this expression? The authorities seem to leave the matter in some doubt. Some lean in the direction of the view that, H in the absence of express stipulation, the deposit is not forfeited by mere non-performance.

I Thus, in Palmer v. Temple (1), a sum of £300 was paid as in the present case, by way of deposit and in part payment, and the agreement stipulated that, if either party should refuse to perform the agreement, he should pay £1,000 to the other party as liquidated damages. The purchaser made default, the vendor re-sold the estate, and the Court of Queen’s Bench held that the vendor’s remedies were restrained by the contract; that he might have sued for the penalty, and recovered such damages as a jury might award. LORD DENMAN, C.J., said (9 Ad. & El. at pp. 520, 521):

“But he cannot retain the deposit, for that must be considered, not as an earnest to be forfeited, but as part payment. But the very idea of payment falls to the ground when both have treated the bargain as at an end; and from that moment the vendor holds the money advanced to the use of the purchaser.”

It is to be observed that the Lord Chief Justice does not seem to have given any force to the words of the contract, which showed that the money was paid by way of deposit as well as in part payment.

In Ockenden v. Henly (6) the question was whether, in ascertaining the deficiency on a re-sale, credit was to be given for the deposit or not; and there LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said (E.B. & E. at pp. 492, 493):

"Now, it is well settled that, by our law, following the rule of the civil law, a pecuniary deposit upon a purchase is to be considered as a payment in part of the purchase money, and not as a mere pledge: SUGDEN ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (13th Edn.), ch. 1, s. 3, art. 18. Therefore, in this case, had the deposit been paid, the balance only of the purchase money would have remained payable. What, then, according to condition 7, is the deficiency arising upon the re-sale which the seller is entitled to recover? We think the difference between the balance of the purchase money on the first sale and the amount of the purchase money obtained on the second sale; or, in other words, the deposit, although forfeited so far as to prevent the purchaser from ever recovering it back, as, without a forfeiture, he might have done—Palmer v. Temple (1), still is to be brought by the seller into account if he seeks to recover as for a deficiency on the re-sale."

On the other hand, in Collins v. Stimson (3), POLLOCK, B., said (11 Q.B.D. at pp. 143, 144):

"According to the law of vendor and purchaser the inference is that such a deposit is paid as a guarantee for the performance of the contract, and, where the contract goes off by default of the purchaser, the vendor is entitled to retain the deposit."

These authorities appear to afford no certain light to answer the inquiry whether, in the absence of express stipulation, money paid as a deposit on the signing of a contract can be recovered by the payer if he has made such default in performance of his part as to have lost all right to performance by the other party to the contract, or damages from him for non-performance. Money paid as a deposit must, I conceive, be paid on some terms implied or expressed. In this case no terms are expressed, and we must, therefore, inquire what terms are to be implied. The terms most naturally to be implied appear to me, in the case of money paid on the signing of a contract, to be that, in the event of the contract being performed, it shall be brought into account, but that, if the contract is not performed by the payer, it shall remain the property of the payee. It is not merely a part payment, but is then also an earnest to bind the bargain so entered into; and creates, by the fear of its forfeiture, a motive in the payer to perform the rest of the contract.

The practice of giving something to signify the conclusion of the contract—sometimes a sum of money, sometimes a ring or other object—to be re-paid or re-delivered on the completion of the contract, appears to be one of great antiquity, and very general prevalence. It may not be unimportant to observe, as evidence of this antiquity, that our own word "earnest" has been supposed to flow from a Phœnician source, through the ἀρραβών of the Greeks, the "arra" or "arrha" of the Latins, and the "arrhes" of the French. It was familiar to the law of Rome; and without going into the distinctions of that law on the subject (see VINNIUS on JUSTINIAN'S INSTITUTES, lib. iii., tit. 24; TRAITÉ DU POTHIER, CONTRAT DE VENTE, part vi., ch. 1, art. 3), it will be enough to observe that the general rule appears to have been that expressed in the INSTITUTES, lib. iii., tit. 24 [tit. 23 in T. E. HOLLAND'S text]:

"Is qui recusat adimplere contractum, si quidem est emptor, perdit quod dedit si vero venditor duplum restituere compellitur, licet super arrhis nihil expressum sit."

Furthermore the earnest did not lose that character, because the same thing might also avail as part payment. VINNIUS says:

- A "Datur autem arrha vel simpliciter, ut sit argumentum duntaxat et probatio emptonis contractæ, veluti si annulus detur; vel ut simul postea cedat in partem pretii, data certa pecunia."
- (VINNIUS ON JUSTINIAN, iii., tit. 24, p. 671, pl. 8, in 1726 Edn.). From the Roman Law the principles relating to the earnest appear to have passed to the early jurisprudence of England. BRACTON (Lib. ii., cap. 27, p. 490, Twiss's edition) says:
- B "Item cum arrarum nomine aliquid datum fuerit ante traditionem, si emptorem emptionis pœnituerit, et a contractu resilire voluerit, perdat quod dedit; si autem venditorem, quod arrarum nomine receperit, emptori restituat duplicatum."
- C Though the liability of the vendor to return to the purchaser twice the amount of the deposit, has long since departed from our law, the passage in question seems an authority for the proposition that the earnest is lost by the party who fails to perform the contract. That earnest and part payment are two distinct things is apparent from s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds, which deals with them as separate acts, each of which is sufficient to give validity to a parol contract [s. 17 repealed; see Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4, itself repealed by Law Reform (Enforcement of
- D Contracts) Act, 1954, s. 2].
- E Taking these early authorities into consideration, I think we may conclude that the deposit in the present case is the earnest or "arrha" of our earlier writers; that the expression used in the present contract, that the money is paid "as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money," relates to the two alternatives, and declares that, in the event of the purchaser making default, the money is to be forfeited, and that, in the event of the purchase being completed, the sum is to be taken in part payment. Such being my view of the nature of the deposit, it appears to me to be clear that the purchaser has lost all right to recover it if he has lost both his right to specific performance in equity and his right to sue for damages for its non-performance at law. That the purchaser has, by his delay, lost all right to specific performance, we have already decided. It remains to inquire whether he
- F has lost all right to sue for damages for its non-performance.
- In my opinion, the time fixed by a contract for the payment of the balance of the purchase money and the completion of the contract was, according to the law as it stood before the Judicature Act, 1873, of the essence of the contract, so that non-payment on that day, provided it was not caused by the default of the vendor, authorised the vendor at law to treat the contract as rescinded. Wilde v. Fort (7),
- G Stowell v. Robinson (8), Noble v. Edwardes (9), and SUGDEN ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, ch. 6, s. 1, are some among many authorities to which I might refer in support of these propositions. Section 25 (7) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, enacted that stipulations in contracts as to time, which would not before the passing of that Act have been deemed to be of the essence of such contracts in a court of equity, should receive in all courts the same construction and effect as
- H they would theretofore have received in equity [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 44]. The effect of this clause is, in my opinion, that the purchaser seeking damages is no longer obliged to prove his willingness and readiness to complete on the day named, but may still recover if he can prove such readiness and willingness within a reasonable time after the stipulated day; and the inquiry, therefore, arises whether the purchaser in the present case could
- I aver and prove such readiness and willingness within a reasonable time. The contract was entered into on Mar. 24, April 24 being fixed for completion; but, by a letter written at the same time, the vendor's solicitor agreed that the clause for re-sale should not be put in force till the lapse of six weeks from April 24. This was not a stipulation postponing the time for completion generally, but merely limiting the exercise of a consequential power. April 24 arrived, but the draft conveyance had not been sent, and the vendor pressed for completion, but in vain. It appears that on June 20 the vendor agreed to give a month's time for completion on the purchaser agreeing to pay certain costs (to which the purchaser assented).

Having regard to all that had occurred before, I consider that the expiration of this month was the latest time at which the purchaser could require the vendor to accept his purchase money and complete. The month expired and no payment was made, and, though this action was begun shortly afterwards, I do not find that any tender of payment has ever been made. A

I conclude, therefore, that the purchaser could not show a readiness and willingness to complete either on the day fixed or within a reasonable time after; but I find, on the contrary, such a protracted default on the purchaser's part, notwithstanding the urgency of the vendor, as, in my opinion, justified the vendor in treating the purchaser as refusing to complete (notwithstanding his protestations of good intentions for the future), and as further justified the vendor in treating the contract as rescinded. In a word, the purchaser has, in my opinion, been guilty of such delay, whether measured by the rules of law or of equity, as deprives him of his right to specific performance and of his right to maintain an action for damages, and under these circumstances I hold that the purchaser has no right to recover his deposit. B C

Yet another point has been raised and demands decision. Clause 8 of the agreement gives, as I have already stated, a power to the vendor to re-sell if the purchaser fails in his performance, and declares that the deficiency on such second sale shall be made good by the defaulting purchaser and be recoverable as liquidated damages. In the present case the defendant, the vendor, declined to perform the contract on the ground of delay on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought this action, and about six months subsequently the vendor re-sold the property at the original price, and it is contended by the plaintiff that the defendant thereby lost all right of retaining the deposit. If the vendor had chosen to re-sell under this power, and to sue the purchaser for the deficiency, he would, in my opinion, and in accordance with Ockenden v. Henly (6), have been obliged to bring the deposit into account, but that is not the course which he has pursued. It appears to me that, when the purchaser had failed on his part down to the last moment which law or equity gave to him, the vendor's title was absolute both to the whole legal and equitable estate in the land sold, and also, by force of the terms of the deposit, to the deposited money also, and that the purchaser could recover no right in this deposit money because the vendor chose to sell his land, as he was entitled to do under his title as absolute legal and equitable owner. The observations of SUGDEN on this subject (VENDOR AND PURCHASER (14th Edn.), p. 40) appear to me very cogent. Whether a clause such as cl. 8 in the present contract gives the vendor a power of re-sale for a default in performance on the very day named it is not now necessary to inquire. But, in my opinion, where there has been such default as justifies the vendor in treating the contract as rescinded, it affords the vendor an alternative remedy, so that he may either affirm the contract and sell under this clause, or rescind the contract and sell under his absolute title. If he act under the clause, he must bring the deposit into account in his claim for the deficiency; if he sell as owner he may retain the deposit, but loses his claim for the deficiency under the clause in question. For these reasons I conclude that the appeal must be dismissed with costs. D E F G H

Licensing—Club—Supply of liquor to members—Members' club—Need for club to hold licence.

A bona fide members' club consisted of about 1,100 members, who paid an entrance fee and periodical subscriptions, the objects of the club being social intercourse and mutual and moral improvement. Trustees of the club property were appointed, in whom, by one of the rules, the property of the club was vested; there was a managing committee to conduct the general business of the club; and the appellant was the manager of the club acting for the committee. Members could obtain food and refreshments in the club, and were also supplied with wine, beer, and spirits for consumption either on or off the club premises, the price charged for liquors in the latter case being 33 per cent. above the cost price. The produce of these transactions went to the funds of the club, which had no licence to sell. In the ordinary course of his duty as manager the appellant supplied, at the club bar, a bottle of whisky and a bottle of beer to a member, for consumption off the club premises, and received from him 3s. 11d. in payment for the same. On the complaint of the respondent, he was convicted and fined 20s. by a metropolitan magistrate for "selling intoxicating liquors by retail without being duly licensed, contrary to s. 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872."

Held: the members were the joint owners of all the property of the club; when the member in question obtained the liquor for which he had asked, and paid a price for it, he already had a legal interest in the liquor and he then purchased the interest of the other members of the club; that transaction did not constitute a sale of the liquor; and, therefore, the appellant had been wrongly convicted.

Case Stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

A complaint was preferred by the respondent against the appellant under s. 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872 [see now Licensing Act, 1953, s. 120 (1)], that he, the appellant, did on May 4, 1881, in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, in the county of Middlesex, unlawfully sell and expose for sale by retail intoxicating liquors at a time when he did not hold a justices' licence authorising him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that intoxicating liquor. At the hearing it was proved or admitted that the Grosvenor Club, situate at 200, Buckingham Palace Road, was a bona fide club properly constituted. Trustees of the club property were appointed, and there was a managing committee to conduct the general business of the club. The appellant Graff was the manager of the club, acting for the committee. There were about 1,100 members of the club, who paid an entrance fee and periodical subscriptions. The objects of the club were social intercourse, mutual and moral improvement, aided by lectures, and rational recreation. One object was to keep the members away from the public-house. They could obtain food and refreshments in the club, and also wine, beer, and spirits on payment.
The produce of such sales went to the funds of the club. The club had no licence to sell liquor. On May 4, 1881, one James Foster, a member of the club and also a licensed victualler, purchased at the bar of the club, a bottle of whisky and a bottle of pale ale, and paid 3s. 11d. for the two. The barman wrapped them up in paper, and Foster, who had a friend not a member of the club with him, carried them away out of the club openly and without concealment. It was also found that liquor to the value of £200 was sold annually to the members for consumption off the premises, and that there was a profit on such sales to the amount of 33 per cent. on the original cost; but it was contended on the appellant's part that they did not amount to a sale of the whisky and ale within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act of 1872, inasmuch as the sale was to a member of the club; that liquor could be sold to members of the club for consumption, either on or off the premises; that one object of the promoters of the club was to enable members to buy for consumption off the premises; that the members were partners in the club property, and, therefore, that the member was only buying his own liquor, and this did not constitute a sale within the meaning of the Act. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the property in the club was vested in the trustees, and that the members of the club were not co-partners. The respondent also contended that the club was not legally entitled to sell liquors either on or off the premises without a licence; but the complainant, who was chairman of the Westminster Licensed Victuallers Protection Society, had no wish to interfere so long as the liquor was bought by a member of the club and consumed on the premises.

It appeared to the learned magistrate that an ordinary club, such as the Grosvenor, was not a partnership in the legal sense of the word, not being an association formed for the purpose of realising a joint profit, though the members of it might be joint owners. The answer to the question whether or not what had occurred amounted to a trading within the meaning of the Act appeared to him to depend upon another, viz.: Did the club derive a profit from their outside selling?
If the price charged was only the strict cost price to the club, and no profit was made, it would not amount to a sale within the Act; it would only be a mode of subdivision among the members; the club committee would only be the agents of the members to purchase, and the member in that case would merely repay his agent the cost price; the transaction would be similar to that of a subscription dinner or picnic, where one man provided the wine and beer for all, and each afterwards contributed in proportion to what he took. But, if a profit was made by the first buyer by charging more than the cost price to the consumer, that would amount to a sale. In the present case a considerable profit, as much as 33 per cent. on the original cost, resulted to the club. In answer to the objection made on behalf of the appellant that the profit did not benefit any individual in a pecuniary way, but only helped to maintain the club, it appeared to be equally a profit of which the members had the advantage. Foster, though a member, bought
I

A the liquor in his individual and separate capacity, and was liable for the amount to the committee. Even if a partnership were admitted, it would make no difference in this respect. The learned magistrate, therefore, came to the conclusion that the sale in question was a sale within the meaning of the Act, and convicted the appellant, fining him 20s.

B The question for the opinion of the court was whether the sale in question of whisky and ale to Foster was a sale of intoxicating liquor by retail within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act of 1872, requiring the seller to be duly licensed?

By s. 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872 :

C "No person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquors without being duly licensed to sell the same; any person selling or exposing for sale by retail any intoxicating liquors which he is not licensed to sell by retail, or selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquor at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same, shall be subject to the following penalties, that is to say. . . ."

D Staveley Hill, Q.C. (with him Sir Hardinge Giffard, Q.C., and Bremner), for the respondent.

F FIELD, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the question which the learned magistrate has asked us in this case must be answered in the negative. In the first place, the word "sale" in the earlier part of the question put to us is introduced there by the magistrate merely as a convenient term whereby to express the transaction in question. The Licensing Act, 1872, within which this transaction is said to come, introduces for the first time the words with which we have to deal today; and though provisions respecting the "sale" of intoxicating liquors and the regulation of public-houses are common enough in various Acts of Parliament since 1828, yet by s. 3 of the Act of 1872 a new and distinct offence was created. That section is one creating an offence and imposing a penalty for the commission of it, and, therefore, before adjudging a person to be liable to that penalty, we must look carefully to see whether, upon a fair and strict construction of the language of the section in question, the person upon whom it is sought to impose the penalty has committed the offence, and so brought himself within the grasp of the section.

G The facts are very short and are very clearly stated in the Case. The club in question is admittedly a bona fide club, having trustees in whom by the rules of the club all the club property is vested, no doubt for the express purpose of enabling them to take such legal proceedings, either civil or criminal, as may be necessary for the protection of the goods and property of the club. But though the general property in the goods of the club is thus vested in the trustees, there are other special properties in such goods also created and vested in certain officers of the club other than the trustees. There is, for instance, a special property in the committee and a special property in the funds of the club vested in the treasurer, while Mr. Graff, the manager, has a special property in the provisions and liquors, so that he may be able to part with them without the necessity of having to obtain the consent of the trustees upon every transaction of that nature. He is the manager of the club, acting, not for the trustees, but for the committee who are his masters, as also in a certain sense are all the members of the club. The committee, I take it, purchase the goods for the use of the club, and pay for them by cheques upon the club funds. The members, it seems, can obtain food and wine and other liquors in the club on payment for the same, the produce thereby realised going to the general funds of the club. The case finds that the sales of liquors to club members for consumption off the premises amounted annually to £200, and that there was an annual profit on such sales to the amount of 33 per cent. on the original cost of the articles. If that had been found to be "profit" in the ordinary commercial sense of the word as a "trade profit," it would, no doubt, have been a considerable element in the consideration of the present question; but it is clear, I think, that the learned magistrate did not use the word "profit" in the sense of its being such a profit as an ordinary retail trader would make, but simply that, whereas the liquors had cost, say, £100, the members of the club would have to pay £133 for them, that extra sum being the fair and just amount to be paid by the members who consumed the liquors in order to cover the expenses of that particular branch of the establishment, which it would not be fair to put upon those members who did not make use of any intoxicating liquors. That, I think, is the meaning of the finding of the learned magistrate with respect to this matter of the profit of 33 per cent. on the sales of liquor. A B

I agree with the learned magistrate that this is not a partnership, but that the members are joint owners of the club property. The true conclusion is, I think, that the members of the club are joint owners of the general property in all the goods of the club, and that the trustees are their agents with respect to such general property, notwithstanding that there are other agents such as the committee and the managers, etc., who have certain special properties in some of the goods vested in them. I am not able to follow the reasoning of the magistrate with regard to the question, whether or not there was a "sale" within the Act, depending upon the price charged and upon whether the club derived or made a profit upon the sale of these liquors. It does not appear to me to be at all material whether the sum which a member pays for the liquor supplied to him is more or less than or equal to its cost price. The transaction is not, in my opinion, made either more or less a "sale" within the statute by reason of any such variation in the price paid for the liquor by the members. The learned magistrate seems to have thought that, if the price charged to the members were exactly equal to the cost price of the article, it would not be a sale within the statute, but that if the price charged to him were more than the cost price, then it would be such a sale. I am unable, as I have said, to follow the reasoning by which he has arrived at that conclusion. C D E

We have to find out, if possible, the meaning of the legislature from the language they have used; and looking at that language, it is clear that they were of opinion that it was very undesirable that intoxicating liquor should be sold anywhere without a licence. The section is limited to a "sale of intoxicating liquors by retail." Who then is it that the legislature is here striking at? Clearly it is at the trader who gains a profit by selling liquor by retail. The wholesale dealer who distributes the liquor on a large scale is not touched at all. Did then Graff, the manager, who, if not with his own hand, at all events by that of his subordinate, the barman, supplied the member with this liquor, sell the same by retail so as to bring the transaction within the section? I do not think that he did. A sale involves in it something in the nature of a bargain. Here there was no bargaining nor any contract between the members and Graff with respect to this liquor. It is part of the terms of membership that every member shall be entitled to obtain a bottle of wine or other liquor on payment of the price fixed for it by the committee. Foster was acting solely upon and within his right as a club member, not by reason of any new contract, but by reason of his old contract of association, by which, upon his subscribing a certain yearly or other periodical sum to the funds of the club, he became entitled to have liquor supplied to him as a member at a certain price. There was no contract of sale, nor could Graff, in my judgment, have maintained an action against Foster as for goods sold and delivered in respect of these bottles of whisky and ale. There were no two parties to any contract, because Foster was a vendor, at all events of a portion of what has been contended was sold to him, as well as a buyer. Looking at the transaction as a purchase by one member of the shares of all the other members in the liquors, Foster was as much a co-owner as a vendor. It was, I think, a transfer of a special property or partial interest in the liquor to Foster; but it was not a sale, or, in the wider language used elsewhere in the Act, "a transaction in the nature of a sale," within the meaning of s. 3. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the conviction must be reversed, and that this appeal must consequently be allowed with costs. F G H I

A HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with counsel for the appellant that s. 3 applies equally to liquor sold for consumption either on or off the club premises. The question before us is one of very considerable importance, for, if this conviction be right, it follows as a logical consequence that every club in the kingdom is liable to penalties in respect of every glass of wine, spirits, or beer that is consumed on the premises. It is, I think, worthy of consideration
B that those who have framed the various Licensing Acts since the year 1828 never considered or intended that clubs should come within them. There is, no doubt, much force in what the learned magistrate has said in putting forward his view of the case; but, with the greatest possible respect for him, I cannot agree with the conclusion to which he has come; and in answer, therefore, to the question which he asks, I say that I do not think there has in fact been in this case a sale of
C intoxicating liquors by retail within the meaning of s. 3 of the statute.

At the time Mr. Foster applied at the bar of the club for this liquor, it seems clear to me that he possessed a property, or at any rate an interest, in the liquors which were then supplied or transferred to him—an interest which counsel for the respondent correctly designated as a one eleven-hundredth part or share therein. What then did he get from the barman who served him? He got from him, on
D payment of the price, the interest of the 1,099 other members of the club, who thereby transferred their rights to him. Taking the definition of a sale to be found in almost all the text writers, namely, that it is “a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money,” I say that here there was no transfer of the absolute or general property in these liquors, but a transfer of a special interest in them—a transfer, that is, of the interest of the other 1,099
E members of the club.

That, in my opinion, is the result of the transaction; and, looking at it in the broadest light in which such a matter ought to be viewed, I cannot think that it was a sale by retail of intoxicating liquors within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. It is obvious from R. v. Wilkinson (1) that clubs of this description could not obtain a licence, and when they part with a portion of their property to a
F member in the way stated in the Case, I do not think it is a sale within the Act, and I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Fatal Accident—Negligence—Collision at sea—Jurisdiction of Admiralty Court—“Claim for damage done by a ship”—Action in rem on behalf of relations of deceased—Competency.

An action under the Fatal Accidents Acts brought for the benefit of the relations of a person whose death is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant is a purely personal action; if the death occurred at sea as the result of a collision between two ships the claim under the Fatal Accidents Act is not a claim “for damage done by a ship” within s. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 [now the Administration of Justice Act, 1956, s. 1 (1) (d)]; and, therefore, an action could not be brought to enforce the claim in rem against the owner of the ship alleged to be to blame for the collision.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 9 P.D. 96, reversing a judgment of BUTT, J., in an action brought in rem against the owner of the Vera Cruz, a Spanish vessel, and her freight and cargo, by the appellant, as administratrix of William Seward, her husband, to recover damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, for the loss of her husband and son, who were drowned in consequence of a collision between the Vera Cruz and the British vessel Agnes, in the Mersey, in August, 1882.

The Vera Cruz was arrested at Liverpool in July, 1883. The defendant appeared under protest, and contended that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action, but BUTT, J., held himself bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Franconia (1), and decided in favour of the jurisdiction.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, that court holding that they were not bound by the decision in The Franconia (1), as the court was equally divided in that case. The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords. A Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., and French for the appellant.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—Both counsel for the appellant have argued this case with so much ability that your Lordships have received all that assistance which it would be possible for counsel to give in order to appreciate the question to be now decided, and, therefore, as the result has been to satisfy your Lordships that the judgment appealed from is right notwithstanding the very considerable conflict of opinion and authority which there was upon the point before, it does not seem to your Lordships necessary to call upon the learned counsel on the other side. B C

This is an action in rem essentially. By the rules of court there are certain provisions made for actions in rem in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division as distinct from the ordinary class of actions. Although it might have been possible to bring an ordinary action, in all respects of the same kind as could be brought in the Queen's Bench Division, in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and though I should be far from entertaining any doubt as to the jurisdiction of that Division to deal with such an action in this, as in any other case (but not more in this than in any other case) if no objection were taken, and no transfer asked for or made, yet this is not an action of that kind. This is an action brought in a form appropriate to actions in rem in the Admiralty Division, of the same kind as might have been brought in the Court of Admiralty before the Judicature Acts were passed, and this question must be determined exactly in the same manner as if the action had been so brought, and as if the Judicature Acts had never been enacted. D E

The question whether such an action lies or not depends altogether upon the construction and effect of ss. 7 and 35 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861. What is noticeable is that most of the sections are expressed in definite terms, leaving no opening for any doubt or question as to the particular cases in which a new jurisdiction is to be given, or an old jurisdiction extended to the Admiralty Court. But s. 7 is expressed in perfectly general words: F

"The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship."

The question which your Lordships have to determine is what is meant by these words "claim for damage done by any ship," whether they can, according to sound principles of construction, be held to include such causes of action as arise under Lord Campbell's Act when death has occurred by reason of the "wrongful act, neglect, or default" of some other person. Section 7 must be construed with s. 35, on which no doubt this action is founded: G

"The jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam." H

That section undoubtedly, according to the natural meaning of the words, shows that, while an option to proceed in rem or in personam is given as to the jurisdiction conferred by the Act, yet from the very nature of such an option every case provided for by the Act is regarded as a proper case for a proceeding in rem, and accordingly the appellant, considering that s. 7 brought cases under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, within the purview of the Admiralty jurisdiction, upon that hypothesis held it to mean such actions as were capable of being brought by a proceeding like the present in rem. If the action cannot be so brought, then I apprehend it will follow ex converso that s. 7 does not extend to this description of claim. I

One thing is quite clear, and that is that whether this particular kind of action can be brought within those words does not depend upon any expressed intention of the legislature to bring it within the clause, for there is not the slightest refer-

ence in that clause to any particular case or class of cases. If it necessarily or properly comes within the words "any claim for damage done by any ship," according to the reasonable construction of those words in connection with the clause which authorises proceedings in rem to enforce such claim, then no doubt the words, being general, would include it; but express or special inclusion is certainly not indicated. Upon that point I cannot but observe that the argument founded on s. 13 of the Act [repealed] seems to me not to assist the appellant, because, when the legislature did intend, under certain special conditions, to deal with cases of which this might be one, it has done so, and that in so many words, and a reference to the jurisdiction given to the Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, makes the intention definite and clear. But there is nothing of that kind in this section, and unless the proposition can be made out that this kind of action necessarily, or at all events legitimately, falls within the words "claim for damage done by any ship," there is not the smallest indication of any intention of the legislature to include it.

It must be remembered that the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, is the source of the right, if the right exists, and we must look to that Act to see whether a claim made under that Act can naturally or properly be described as a "claim for damage done by any ship." The first observation which occurs is this—there is not a word about ships in the Act of 1846. It is an Act which deals with a category of cases, which may include injuries done by persons responsible for the navigation of ships to persons suffering by faults in that navigation, but it only includes them as part of a much larger and more general category of cases, and without any express reference to or mention of any particular case which may fall under that category. Therefore, no one can say that the Act relates expressly to claims for damage done by ships, and s. 7 of the Act of 1861 relates to that and to nothing else. Maritime damage by ships is the subject of that legislation; general injuries resulting in loss of life by wrongful acts and so forth, are the subject of the other. It is not very likely that when the legislation goes on such different lines it should be intended indirectly to affect by the one legislation, and in a peculiar manner, a particular case which may or may not arise under the other legislation.

I

But that is not all. Inasmuch as there can be no right of action whatever unless it comes within the terms of the Fatal Accidents Act, let us see whether those are terms which can be brought reasonably and naturally and consistently within the interpretation sought to be imposed on s. 7 of the Act of 1861, which statute turns the action into an action in rem at the option of the plaintiff. What are the words?

I

"Whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured . . ."

"Wrongful act, neglect or default" are all words plainly applicable only to a person doing an act or guilty of a neglect or default and not to an inanimate instrument or thing like a ship, and "maintain an action and recover damages" plainly points to a common law action. It is to my mind, as plain as possible, that the action given by the Act of 1846 is a personal action given for a personal injury inflicted by a person who would have been liable to an action for damages, manifestly in the common law courts if the death had not ensued. The Act gives a new cause of action clearly, and does not merely remove the operation of the maxim, actio personalis moritur cum persona, because the action is given in substance, not to the person representing in point of estate the deceased man, who would naturally represent him as to all his own rights of action which could survive, but to his wife and children, no doubt suing in point of form in the name of his executor. Not only so, but the action is not an action which he could have brought if he had survived the accident, for that would have been an action for such injury as he had sustained during his lifetime; but death is essentially the cause of the action, an action which he never could have brought under circumstances which, if he had been living, would have given him, for an injury short of death which he might have sustained, a right of action, which might have been barred either by contributory negligence, or by his own fault, or by his own release, or in various other ways. [The defence of contributory negligence was abolished by the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945].

Every word of that legislation being, as it appears to me, legislation for the general case, and not for particular injury by ships, points to a common law action, points to a personal liability, and a personal right to recover, and is absolutely at variance with the notion of a proceeding in rem. But the matter does not stop there, because the peculiarity of the legislation is that [s. 2], the action being given for the benefit of the "wife, husband, parent and child" of the dead person.

"the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct."

It is assumed that there would be a jury, and there are other provisions, one as to the time within which the action is to be brought [s. 3], another as to what the plaintiff is to do [s. 4]:

"In every such action the plaintiff on the record shall be required, together with the declaration, to deliver to the defendant or his attorney, a full particular of the person or persons for whom and on whose behalf such action shall be brought, and of the nature of the claim . . ."

The proposition is too clear to admit of dispute, that, if s. 7 of the Act of 1861 has the effect of transferring that action to the Court of Admiralty to be brought under the Admiralty rules and system, tried without a jury, and enforced in rem and not in personam, without making any person individually a defendant as liable to an action for damages, without making any person a defendant on the record and declaring against him, to whom or to whose attorney full particulars can be delivered, and so on, the Act of 1861 has materially varied the effect of the Act which gives the right of action. If anything be certain it is that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so. For that principle I may refer to Hawkins v. Gathercole (2). That case arose under the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 13 [replaced by Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 195] which provided that a judgment should be binding (inter alia) on all the interest of the debtor in "lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments," and that for the amount of the judgment these different descriptions of property to which he might be entitled should be charged in the same manner as if "the person against whom such judgment shall have been entered up had power to charge the same hereditaments, and had by writing under his hand agreed to charge the same with the amount of such judgment debt."

The question arose as to an ecclesiastical benefice. By the restraining Act of Elizabeth [13 Eliz. 1, c. 20 (1571), repealed by Statute Law Revision Act, 1948] a clergyman had no power to charge his benefice, but LORD CRANWORTH thought when the case came before him in the first instance that those words in s. 13, in favour of the creditor, did away with the effect of the Act of Queen Elizabeth, and put the clergyman in the situation of a man who could charge and who had charged.

A But that decision was reversed. It was held that all those general words about tithes and rectories and so on in the Act of 1838 were capable of a reasonable application to subjects not affected by any particular legislation, and that the statute of Elizabeth not being referred to in any way, the Act being in diversa materia, and not containing the slightest indication of any such intention, was not unnecessarily to be repealed or altered by such general words. I need not read
B more from the case than the words of TURNER, L.J. (6 De G.M. & G. at p. 31):

“Can the statute of Elizabeth be held to be practically repealed by such general words as are contained in s. 13 of this statute? I venture to think that it cannot, grounding that opinion upon the authorities to which I have generally referred, and adding to them the eleventh case in JENKINS’ fifth century [EIGHT CENTURIES OF REPORTS] in which it is thus said: ‘A special statute does not derogate from a special statute without express words of abrogation.’ ”

To me it seems to be not only easy, but right, to construe the words in the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, in a sense in which they are quite inapplicable to this particular cause of action, and leave all the provisions of the Fatal Accidents
D Act, 1846, in full force and effect, not modified or interfered with, because in truth “damage done by any ship” was a form of expression naturally applicable to that description of damage—maritime damage—as to which, in cases falling within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, the ship was treated as, so to say, in delicto, and was liable to a proceeding in rem, such as s. 35 of the Act contemplated. I think that I have said all that is really necessary.

E The argument from the Merchant Shipping Act, as it appears to me, manifestly fails. There, where the legislature did intend for the purpose of giving effect to the limited liability of shipowners and administering a fund brought into court to answer that liability, that this description of claim against the owners of the ship should be brought into account as well as other claims, it made provisions giving a jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery which has since been transferred to the Court
F of Admiralty. It made provision giving a jurisdiction in those cases to the Court of Chancery in order to effect the express and manifest intention of the legislature for that particular and limited purpose, and it would involve so much and only so much modification of the provisions of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as might be necessary to give effect to the intention so declared [see Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, as amended by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 69, Merchant
G Shipping Act, 1948, s. 4 (3), and Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958]. But there is nothing of that kind here. What you have bearing upon that subject is in the enactment which applies only to the case of competing claims, and the case where the rule of limited liability is to be applied and a fund is brought into court to answer it. That is not the case here. The judgment appealed from appears to me to be entirely right, and I move your Lordships to H dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Before the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, where a person had been injured from any of the causes mentioned in s. 1 of the Act, and had died, the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona applied, he could not sue, for he was dead, and it did not survive
I to anybody whomsoever to sue for the damages occasioned by the accident which had caused injury to him resulting in death. That the legislature, at the instance of LORD CAMPBELL, thought fit to alter; and I think that when the Act of 1846 is looked at it is plain enough that, if a person dies under the circumstances mentioned when he might have maintained an action if it had been for an injury to himself which he had survived, a totally new action is given against the person who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived, an action which, as it is pointed out in Pym v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (3), is new in its species, new in its quality, new in its principle, in every way new, and one which can only be brought if there is any person answering the description of the widow, parent, or child, who suffers pecuniary loss by the death. A

That is a personal action, if personal action there ever can be. It is quite plain (it does not require much more than to state it) that if a man who has the custody and management of a ship manages it in such a way that by his negligence, or from any other cause which is mentioned in s. 1, a person is killed, that man is liable under the Act of 1846, and also if that man is a servant acting for a superior (the shipowner is generally speaking the person), if he is the servant of the shipowner who is the principal, the shipowner is answerable under this cause of action. That being so, the legislature by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, when they were renewing former enactments which limited the liability of a shipowner according to the value of his ship, thought fit to say that, if the owner of the ship was as such made liable under the Act of 1846 (for that is what they meant), it shall be included in those claims which are to be divided rateably according to the value of the ship to which the liability of the shipowner is limited; and a jurisdiction was given by s. 514 to the Court of Chancery to enforce the limitation of the liability, and for that purpose it had various collateral powers. That was the state of things in 1854 and down to 1861, and I think there cannot be the least doubt that at that time the remedy which the widow, parent, or child would have, the action being brought in form by the administrator with all the provisions which have been already read, providing that the matter should be properly done, would be a personal action, and a personal action only; and whether the liability of the person who was sued was because he was the owner of the ship, in which case he would have a limit to his liability under the Act of 1854, or because he was the owner of a stage coach, it would be a personal liability only. B C D E

The legislature undoubtedly had full power to enact that the Court of Admiralty should have what jurisdiction they chose to give it. The question depends on the construction of s. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, the words there used being that the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. That being so, what do these words mean? If the question now raised had been that which the Court of Queen's Bench, of which I was a member, treated as raised in Smith v. Brown (4)—that was a case under Lord Campbell's Act and under Lord Campbell's Act only, but it was treated as general—if the question now raised had been whether personal damage to a man who lived was within s. 7 of the enactment, I should have had, as I then had, some doubt about the matter, and it would have carried me so far that, if that had been the question now raised, I certainly should have wished to hear the case argued out to the end before giving an opinion upon it one way or the other. But the question raised here being exclusively whether the liability of a shipowner as a person, under the Act of 1846, to make good damages for the negligence of his servant, the master of the ship, comes within the words "damage done by any ship," I decidedly say that I do not think it does. The legislature, in using such general words as those, cannot have had in contemplation all the numerous and important subjects which, had they been considering the Act of 1846, they would have had. For instance, no one seems to have thought of the case of a Swedish ship or a French ship on the high seas causing the drowning of an Englishman, and afterwards coming to England. There would have been a very serious international question raised in that case whether the English legislature had enacted (as it beyond doubt had full power to enact) that when the ship came to England there should be power to enforce against the Frenchman or the Norwegian reparation for the loss of life which his own law did not give, though the accident which caused it happened on the high seas. In the present case the Spaniard's ship was in the Mersey, in English waters, when the occurrence took place; but the point upon the construction of the Act of 1861 would have been just the same if the collision by which the accident had occurred had been in the Bay of Biscay. There would have been no difference that I can perceive in the matter, and that is obviously a very serious question indeed which should be carefully considered in inquiring whether the F G H I

- A legislature, when passing that Act, intended it to have any such meaning. That is no reason for saying that, if the words of the statute plainly and obviously have that meaning and show that that was intended, foolish and rash and improvident as we may think it to have been, we must not give them that effect. But when the question comes to be whether there are words in any way pointing to liability under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, or to the defendant's liability under that Act, that seems to me to be a very strong argument indeed for saying that the words are not to be so construed, and consequently that the Court of Admiralty had not in 1862 any such jurisdiction as is now claimed.

- LORD WATSON.—Notwithstanding the very full and able argument which has been addressed to the House by the counsel for the appellant, I entertain no doubt that a right of action such as is given by the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in a case like the present is not a "claim for damage done by a ship" within the meaning of s. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861. Upon that ground, and upon that ground only, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

- G Shipping—Bill of lading—Endorsement in blank—Security for loan—Liability of holder to shipowner for freight—Bills of Lading Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict., c. 111), s. 1.

- H The effect of an endorsement in blank on a bill of lading and the deposit of the bill with a holder by way of security for a loan while the goods are in transitu is not to pass to the holder the whole legal title of the goods, but only to pledge them, passing at law a special property in the goods and leaving the general property in the shipper. Therefore, the holder of such a bill in such circumstances is not an endorsee to whom the property in the goods has passed within s. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, and so is not liable, by reason of such endorsement only, to an action for freight by the shipowner.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., BOWEN, L.J., dissenting), reported 13 Q.B.D. 159, reversing a decision of FIELD, J. (reported 10 Q.B.D. 363), upon further consideration of an action brought by the respondent, James Burdick, on behalf of himself and others, the owners of the steamship Zoe, against the appellants, Sewell & Nephew, bankers, endorsees for value of a bill of lading, to recover the sum of £174 8s. 9d., with interest, for freight, primage, and disbursements on sixty cases of spinning machinery shipped in the Zoe in 1880 by one Necessiantz, and carried from London to Poti, a port in the Black Sea.

I The action was tried by FIELD, J., and a special jury in April, 1882. In the course of the trial the jury were, by consent of both parties, discharged, and the learned judge adjourned the case for further consideration. The case was argued on further consideration in November, 1882, and in February, 1883, the learned judge delivered judgment in favour of the defendants, the present appellants. It appeared that in the bill of lading Henry Head & Co., as agents, were named as the shippers, and the goods were made deliverable at Poti margin, or in default of such payment the owners or agents to have an absolute lien on the goods, discharging them in their name and holding them till all costs, freight, primage, interest, and insurance should be paid in full, and to have liberty to sell the goods by auction and retain the freight and primage and all charges."

“unto Mr. D. S. Necessiantz, Kutais, or to his or their assigns, freight, primage, and disbursements of the said goods to be paid at destination, as per

The Zoe reached Poti with the goods in the month of September, 1880, and, as no one appeared to clear the goods, they were on Oct. 14, 1880, landed and warehoused at the Russian Custom House, with the usual stop for freight. On Oct. 26, Nercessiantz, who had previously had business transactions with the defendants, applied to them for a temporary loan of £300 to enable him to complete the payment in this country for the goods, and as security for the advance he deposited with the defendants the bill of lading of the goods. By the Russian law goods landed and not cleared within twelve months were liable to be sold for duty and charges, and, as Nercessiantz did not appear to claim the goods in question, they were sold by the Russian Customs officials, but the proceeds were insufficient to do more than to satisfy their claim. The present action for the freight of the goods was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as the owners of the goods of which they held the bill of lading. FIELD, J., found as a fact that Nercessiantz, in depositing the bill of lading, and the defendants in making the advance, did not intend anything more than a pledge, or that the property in the goods should pass so as to make the defendants liable for the freight as the real owners of the goods, but that it was intended to leave the general property with Nercessiantz, contemplating that he would deliver the goods to the parties for whom he had bought them, and that the possession of the bill of lading would enable the defendants to stop their advance out of the proceeds by making them a necessary party to the delivery, or, at the lowest, to put it in their power to compel the borrower to redeem the pledge and thus obtain the only document by which he could obtain delivery of the goods and perform his contract. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the defendants appealed to the House of Lords.

Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., and Danckwerts for the appellants.

C. Hall, Q.C., and Edwyn Jones for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 5, 1884. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—This appeal raises the question whether, under the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, every holder of a bill of lading, endorsed in blank, who has taken it by way of security for an advance of money (and has not afterwards parted with it), is liable, by reason of such endorsement only, to an action for freight by the shipowner, although he may not have obtained delivery of the goods, or derived any other benefit from his security.

The difference between the learned judges in the court below mainly, if not altogether, turned upon the question whether, according to the authorities, from Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) downwards, the effect of an endorsement and deposit of a bill of lading, while the goods are in transitu, by way of security for a loan, is to pass the whole legal title to the goods, or only to pledge them, passing at law a "special property" and leaving the "general property" in the shipper. That question was much debated in Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Docks Co. (2), where BRETT, L.J., expressed the same opinion on which he acted in the present case, BRAMWELL, L.J., taking the opposite view. LORD BLACKBURN, in his opinion on that case when it reached this House, adverted to the point, but thought it unnecessary to express any opinion upon it.

In the present case the true question is whether the property in the goods passed to the endorsee upon or by reason of the endorsement within the meaning of these words as used in s. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855. It was considered by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., that, if the object of the endorsement and deposit was (as they thought) to pass the whole legal title to the goods to the

A appellants as endorsees, leaving an equitable interest only in the shipper, it was a necessary consequence that the property passed to them within the meaning of the statute, and that the respondent, the shipowner, was entitled to recover under the statute in this action. They clearly used the words "legal" and "equitable" in that technical sense which they have acquired in English law. I am not myself satisfied that this consequence is necessary; but I admit that there are difficulties

B in the way of the contrary view, as there are also difficulties (arising from the strong and unqualified language used by judges of great authority, from the time when Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) was decided downwards) in the way of the opinion that an endorsement and deposit of a bill of lading, in a case like the present, operates by way of pledge and not as an assignment of the whole legal title to the goods. The facts here are simply an endorsement in blank, and deposit of the

C bills of lading, so endorsed, by way of security for money advanced. There are no special circumstances, except that the endorsee never did obtain, and that it was never possible for him (in fact) to obtain, delivery of the goods.

I should not feel greatly embarrassed, if there were no other authority, by the mere terms in which the custom of merchants was found in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) (5 Term Rep. 683), viz., that

D "bills of lading are, after the shipment and before the voyage performed, negotiable and transferable by the shipper's endorsement and delivery... and that, by such endorsement and delivery, the property in such goods is transferred."

This, it may be said, is the language of the Bills of Lading Act. But I do not

E understand it as necessarily meaning more than that "the property" which it might be the intent of the transaction to transfer, whether special or general, passes by such an endorsement, according to the custom of merchants. The finding must be reasonably understood. It cannot, for instance, mean that the property will be transferred when there is no consideration. But, although the custom as found seems to me to be consistent with the view taken by FIELD, J., and BOWEN, L.J., F in the present case, I have more difficulty in saying that the language of BULLER, J., in the earlier stages of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) (2 Term Rep. 63) is so.

In some later cases other great judges have not only followed, but have even gone beyond, that language. The Court of Queen's Bench, in Re Westzinthus (3), held that a right of stoppage in transitu might be exercised against the interest remaining in the shipper, subject to the security created by the endorsement and

G deposit of the bill of lading; but they did so on the ground, not that the shipper retained any legal title or interest, but that he had an equity of redemption, of which the form in which the question then arose enabled the court to take notice. And, although it is true that in Harris v. Birch (4) the Court of Exchequer, then composed of PARKE, ALDERSON, GURNEY, and ROLFE, BB., decided a question of stamp duty upon the ground that an endorsement and deposit of a bill of lading

H by way of security operated as a pledge, and COLERIDGE, J., in Jenkyns v. Brown (5) considered it to pass a special property only to the endorsee, leaving the general property in the shipper, and in Meyerstein v. Barber (6) all the judges of the Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber concurred in that view, yet, on the other hand, when Meyerstein v. Barber (6) came to the House of Lords, where the judgments of those courts were affirmed, LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., and LORD

I WESTBURY used strong language of an opposite kind.

"If anything could be supposed to be settled in mercantile law, I apprehend it would be this, that, when goods are at sea, the parting with the bill of lading... is parting with the ownership of the goods.... I apprehend that it would shake the course of proceeding between merchants, as sanctioned by decided cases.... if we were to hold that the assignment of the bill of lading, the goods being at the time at sea, does not pass the whole and complete ownership of the goods, so that any person taking a subsequent bill of lading, be it the second or be it the third, must be content to submit to the loss which would arise from that state of facts." A

These words are hardly, if at all, qualified by the context, although, in a later sentence, as to which see the remarks of LORD BLACKBURN in Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (2) (post page 680), the proposition is less absolute (L.R. 4 H.L. at p. 326):

"When the vessel is at sea, and the cargo has not yet arrived, the parting with the bill of lading is parting with that which is the symbol of property, and which, for the purpose of conveying a right and interest in the property, is the property itself." B

LORD WESTBURY's language is similar, perhaps stronger. He said (ibid. at pp. 335, 336, 337):

"No doubt the transfer of it [the bill of lading] for value passes the absolute property in the goods." C

He quoted some words of ERLE, C.J., to which I shall afterwards refer, as having the same sense; he spoke of the first holder for value of the bill of lading as having "the legal ownership of the goods," "the legal right in the property,"

"both the right of property and the right of possession, passing by a symbol, the bill of lading, which is at once both the symbol of the property and the evidence of the right of possession." D

To reconcile these expressions with those used in the same case by the judges of the Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber is scarcely possible, and yet no dissent from the views of those learned judges was expressed in this House; on the contrary, their reasoning, and especially that of WILLES, J., was referred to with apparent approval, particularly by LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., and LORD CHELMSFORD. E

In such a conflict, not of decisions, but of judicial phraseology, if not of doctrine, it becomes important to remember that it is often dangerous to infer, even from very strong words when used diverso intuitu, conclusions on other subjects which, if they had been present to the minds of the speakers, might perhaps have led to their being more guarded or qualified. None of the cases to which I have referred arose upon the statute with which your Lordships have now to deal; they related, some to the right of stoppage in transitu, some to competing claims between holders for value of different parts of the same set of bills of lading. It may well be that, as against all such claims, and against parties setting up interests adverse to the title of the endorsee for value, such words as "the legal ownership," "the legal right," "the right of property in the goods," might be used, and the property which passed to the endorsee might be described as "absolute," in a sense substantially true, even though such property might, as between the endorsee receiving and the shipper depositing the bill of lading by way of security, be special only and not general, and though the most apt term for a scientific definition of the transaction, as between the borrower and the lender, may be, not assignment or transfer, but pledge. F G H

In such a state of authority it is important to see how the matter stands in principle. In principle, the custom of merchants, as found in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), seems to be as much applicable and available to pass a special property at law by the endorsement, when that is the intent of the transaction, as to pass the general property, when the transaction is, e.g., one of sale. In principle, also, there seems to be nothing in the nature of a contract to give security by the delivery of a bill of lading endorsed in blank, which requires more, in order to give it full effect, than a pledge, accompanied by a power to obtain delivery of the goods when they arrive, and, if necessary, to realise them for the purpose of the security. Whether the endorsee, when he takes delivery to himself, may not be entitled to assume, and may not be held to assume towards the shipowner, the position of full proprietor is a different question. But, so long at all events as the goods are in I

A transitu, there seems to be no reason why the shipper's title should be displaced, any further than the nature and intent of the transaction require.

This is not inconsistent with what was said by ERLE, C.J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (6) (L.R. 2 C.P. at p. 45), that

B "the endorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, while the ship is at sea, operate exactly the same as the delivery of the goods themselves to the assignee after the ship's arrival would do."

That learned judge cannot have meant that possession of the symbol is, for every purpose, the same thing as actual possession of the goods; what he did mean was, that the endorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, by way of pledge, which he considered to be the effect of the transaction in that case, was equivalent, and

C not more than equivalent, to a delivery by way of pledge of the goods themselves. LORD HARDWICKE, in Snee v. Prescott (7), thought that there was a difference between an endorsement of a bill of lading in blank and a personal endorsement, and for some purposes I think there is much reason for that opinion. If, from a personal endorsement, the inference might properly be drawn that a title by assignment, as distinguished from pledge, was meant to pass to the endorsee, it would

D not, in my opinion, follow that the same inference ought to be drawn from an endorsement in blank.

Part of the custom of merchants, found in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) (5 Term Rep. at p. 686), was, that

E "endorsements of bills of lading in blank . . . may be filled up by the person . . . to whom they are delivered or transmitted, with words ordering the delivery of the goods . . . to be made to such person; and, according to the practice of merchants, the same, when filled up, have the same operation and effect as if it had been . . . done by the shipper."

Whether it is or is not usual in practice to fill up the blank with any name before taking delivery, it is certainly not to be implied from the custom, as thus found, that the operation of the endorsement, while it remains in blank, is necessarily to

F all intents and purposes exactly the same as if it were filled up with the holder's name. So long as it remains in blank it may pass from hand to hand by mere delivery, or it may be redelivered to the shipper without any new transfer or endorsement, which would not be the case if there were a personal endorsement.

It would be strange if the Bills of Lading Act has made a person whose name has never been upon the bill of lading, and who, as between himself and the shipowner, has never acted upon it, liable to an action by the shipowner upon a contract to which he was not a party. I am not, however, sure, that, for the decision of the present appeal, it is really necessary to rely, either upon any difference between a personal endorsement and one in blank, or upon the distinction between such a form of security as in English law might be held to pass the whole legal

H title and a simple pledge. The statute with which your Lordships have now to deal is introduced by a preamble, the material part of which is that

"by the custom of merchants a bill of lading of goods being transferable by endorsement the property of the goods may thereby pass to the endorsee, but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner, and it is expedient that such rights

I should pass with the property."

Section 1 enacts :

"Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every endorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass, upon or by reason of such consignment or endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

Section 2 provides :

"Nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect any right of stoppage in transitu, or any right to claim freight against the original shipper or owner, or any liability of the consignee or endorsee by reason or in consequence of his being such consignee or endorsee, or of his receipt of the goods by reason or in consequence of such consignment or endorsement."

There is nothing else material in that Act.

This statute contemplates the passing of "the property in the goods," by the endorsement of the bill of lading, as a thing which may, or may not happen, according to the nature and intent of the contract or dealing for the purpose of which that endorsement is made; and it seems to provide for those cases only in which the property so passes as to make it just and convenient that all rights of suit under the contract contained in the bill of lading should be "transferred to" the endorsee, and should not any longer "continue in the original shipper or owner." One test of the application of the statute may, perhaps, be whether, according to the true intent and operation of the contract between the shipper and the endorsee, the shipper still retains any such proprietary right in the goods as to make it just and reasonable that he should also retain rights of suit—the word is "suit," not "action"—against the shipowner under the contract contained in the bill of lading. If he does, the statute can hardly be intended to take from him those rights and transfer them to the endorsee. If they are not transferred to the endorsee, neither is the endorsee subjected to the shipper's liabilities. It is very difficult to conceive that when the goods are still in transitu, when the substance of the contract is not sale and purchase, but borrowing and lending, and when the endorsement and deposit of the bill of lading is only by way of security for a loan, it can be the intention of either party thereby, without more, to divest the shipper of all proprietary right to the goods, and to take from him and transfer to the endorsee all rights of suit under the contract with the shipowner. That some proprietary right—his original right, subject only to the creditor's security—remains in him is indisputable. If that proposition needed illustration from authority, it would be found in Re Westzinthus (3), Spalding v. Ruding (8), and Kemp v. Falk (9). Can it be that he is by the statute deprived of all remedies, legal and equitable, under the bill of lading as long as it remains in the hands of the secured creditor? The creditor in the ordinary course of things will do nothing until the time for payment or delivery of the goods arrives.

Can it, then, be material whether the proprietary right thus remaining in the shipper while the goods are in transitu is legal or equitable? The statute relates to a subject of general mercantile law in which not Englishmen only, but foreigners also, may be, and often are, concerned. Foreign as well as British endorsements of bills of lading by way of security for advances which may be made abroad, perhaps in countries not governed by English laws, are liable to be affected by it whenever recourse must be had to British courts. It seems to me to be inconceivable that the construction of the words "the property in the goods" in such a statute can have been intended to depend upon any such technical distinction as that made in English law, but by no means in the laws of all other countries in which the customs of merchants prevail, between legal and equitable titles. It is to be observed, further, that the statute contemplates beneficium cum onere, and not onus sine beneficio. It may be reasonable if the endorsee has the benefit, as he would if he were a purchaser out and out, or if under his title as endorsee of the bill of lading he obtained delivery of the goods to himself, that he should take it with its corresponding burden, quoad the shipowner. But it would be the reverse of reasonable to impose on him such a burden when he has neither entered into any contract of which it might be the natural result, nor, having taken a mere security, has obtained any benefit from it.

This observation is fortified by the fact that the statute does not appear to distinguish between endorsements subsequent and those anterior to its enactment.

- A On the other hand, it seems impossible to suppose the legislature to have passed this statute without some reference to the custom proved in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), and to the law, whatever may be the true view of it, established on the same subject by later authorities in the English courts. And if, as I think, it ought to be understood with some reference to that custom and to those authorities, I cannot persuade myself that its operation is altogether restricted to cases of out-and-out sale, or that an endorsee of a bill of lading, by way of security, who converts his symbolical into real possession by obtaining delivery of the goods ought never to derive any benefit from it. The authorities decided upon the statute appear to me to be most easily reconciled with its apparent objects and with each other by a view which, if hardly consistent with expressions to be found in some other cases, nevertheless seems to me to have a real and substantial foundation in reason and good sense—viz., that the endorsee by way of security, though not having “the property” passed to him absolutely and for all purposes by the mere endorsement and delivery of the bill of lading while the goods are at sea, has a title by means of which he is enabled to take the position of full proprietor upon himself with its corresponding burdens, if he thinks fit, and that he actually does so, as between himself and the shipowner, if and when he claims and takes delivery of the goods by virtue of that title.

- The authorities decided upon by the statute are Fox v. Nott (10), Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (11), The Figlia Maggiore (12), and The Freedom (13). Another case, Short v. Simpson (14) was also cited during the argument at your Lordships’ Bar. In Fox v. Nott (10) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the endorsement of the bill of lading. In Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (11) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the endorsement of the bill of lading. In The Figlia Maggiore (12) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the endorsement of the bill of lading. In The Freedom (13) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the endorsement of the bill of lading. In Short v. Simpson (14) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the endorsement of the bill of lading.
- E a case provided for by s. 2, but some of the learned judges expressed opinions bearing upon the general construction of the statute. POLLOCK, C.B., said (6 H. & N. at p. 686):

“The endorsee of the bill of lading may be sued under this statute, because by taking the goods he also takes the liability to the freight.”

- F MARTIN, B., said (ibid. at p. 687):

“The statute means an actual vesting of the property, as by bargain and sale.”

WILDE, B., said (ibid. at p. 640):

- G “I agree with my brother MARTIN that the Act applies only to an absolute transfer of the goods, and was never intended to deprive a person who made advances on the security of the bill of lading of the benefit of the original contract of the shipper to pay the freight.”

In Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (11) the endorsee for value of a bill of lading, who had endorsed it over to a third party, was held not to be liable to the shipowner. ERLE, C.J., said (11 C.B.N.S. at p. 847):

- H “The contention on the part of the plaintiff is that, the property in the goods passing to the defendants by the assignment of the bill of lading, under the Act, they are liable for the freight, although they never received the goods. . . . The contention is, that the consignee or assignee shall always remain liable, like the consignor, although he has parted with all interest and property in the goods by assigning the bill of lading to a third party before the arrival of the goods. The consequences which this would lead to are so monstrous, so manifestly unjust, that I should pause before I consented to adopt this construction of the Act of Parliament. The person who received the goods was always considered liable for the freight; but that was not by virtue of an original liability as a contracting party, but on a contract implied from his acceptance of the goods. Looking at the whole statute, it seems to me that the obvious meaning is that the assignee who receives the cargo shall have all the rights and liabilities of a contracting party; but that, if he passes on the bill of lading by endorsement to another, he passes on all the rights and liabilities which the bill of lading carries with it.”
- I

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., agreed. He said :

"Looking at the preamble and at the general scope and intention of the statute, I can entertain no doubt that the view presented by my Lord is the true one."

He explained the effect of "the general scope" of the Act to be

"that, where the right of property leaves the party, the rights and liabilities under the contract leave him also."

A case like the present, of a security on an endorsed bill of lading, not acted upon, and which, in fact, never could be acted upon by taking delivery of the goods, but at the same time not transferred to any other person, differs in specie from that of a man who has transferred the bill of lading by endorsing it over to another. But I cannot see that it would be more reasonable to make the holder of such a security, which he has never realised, and never can realise, liable under the statute, than if he had parted with the bill of lading to somebody else.

The Figlia Maggiore (12) and The Freedom (13) were determined in the Court of Admiralty under another statute, which, as DR. LUSHINGTON, and his successor, in my opinion, rightly held, gave that court jurisdiction when, and only when, there was, independently of that statute, a right of action or suit; and, in those particular cases, it appears to have been held that there was no such right of action or suit, unless it was given by the Bills of Lading Act. In both of them the plaintiffs, endorsees by way of security of bills of lading, had claimed and obtained delivery of the goods, and then had brought actions against the shipowners for damage which they had sustained through breaches of the contracts contained in the bills of lading, and they were held entitled to recover. This was right, if an endorsee, under such circumstances, may rightly be held entitled to the benefit of the statute, as having elected to complete his potential and inchoate title by taking possession of the goods, and as placing himself towards the shipowner in the position of proprietor. May it not be said that "the property in the goods" then, if not before, "passes" to him "by reason of the endorsement?" The principle of the liability which, under some circumstances, was held, even before the statute, to attach to the endorsee taking delivery, was regarded by ERLE, C.J., in Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (11), as elucidating the policy and objects of the statute itself; and both he and POLLOCK, C.B., in Fox v. Nott (10), spoke of "taking the goods," and "receiving the cargo," as the test of its application. The authorities on that subject, Jesson v. Solly (15); Stindt v. Roberts (16); Wegener v. Smith (17); Chappel v. Comfort (18), seem, from this point of view, to deserve consideration.

The decision of the Court of Admiralty in The Freedom (13) was affirmed by Her Majesty in Council, upon the advice of the Judicial Committee; and, although it was on a point as to which the Admiralty had only a statutory jurisdiction, concurrent with the courts of common law, and though in all Admiralty cases the appeal now lies to this House, still this, as the decision of a court of final appeal, ought not, in any later case, to be lightly departed from. Short v. Simpson (14) did not really require anything to be decided as to the effect of the statute, and nothing was, in fact, so decided. It was there held that, quocunque modo, whether under the statute or independently of the statute, the shipper, to whom a bill of lading, which he had endorsed and delivered to his creditor by way of security, was re-endorsed and re-delivered upon payment of the loan, was remitted to his original rights.

Upon the whole, I cannot dissemble that the present case appears to me to be attended with some considerable difficulties. But those difficulties are mainly technical, arising out of a comparison of the language of the statute with various and not always consistent forms of expression, found in authorities not decided with a view to any such consequences as those which the statute would produce. They deal with questions between unpaid vendors of goods comprised in bills of lading and bona fide endorsees of the same bills of lading for value, or between competing and adverse claimants to priority as bona fide holders for value of the

A bills of lading themselves. The statute, on the other hand, deals with questions between shippers and endorsees of bills of lading claiming under them, and between endorsees and shipowners. The preponderance of principle and reason appears to me to be against the proposition that, as between those parties, it can have been intended by, or can be the effect of, the statute to make the creditor of the shipper liable, in effect, as his surety to the shipowner, with whom he was
 B never brought in contact, by reason only of the deposit with him, by way of security, of a bill of lading endorsed in blank, his right, under that deposit being, whether at law or in equity, special and not general, and the shipper retaining, whether at law or in equity, the real and substantial property in the goods, subject to the security. It had not, until the present case, been directly or indirectly determined, by any authority, that such is the effect of the statute. My conclusion
 C is that the appellants ought to be exonerated, by your Lordships' judgment, from the respondents' action, and that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—The judgment of FIELD, J., was reversed by the order now under appeal. The case was tried before him without a jury, and I think it
 D is necessary to see what he had to determine. There was no question between vendor and vendee nor of stoppage in transitu raised, for there was neither a vendor nor a stoppage. The law and decisions as to stoppage in transitu might be relevant in construing the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, but did not otherwise affect the rights of the parties. It was not suggested that the defendants were, at the time the goods were shipped, in any way interested in the goods, nor that they
 E were, either as undisclosed principals or otherwise, parties to the contract in the bill of lading until it was delivered to them after the ship had sailed and the goods were in the hands of the shipowners to be carried under the bill of lading, and were not yet delivered, with an endorsement in blank by Necessiantz, the consignee named in the bill of lading. I do not think that, either at the trial or on the argument, it was at all disputed that at common law the remedy of the shipowner under a bill of lading was by enforcing his lien upon the goods, or by bringing
 F an action on the contract against anyone who, at the time when the goods were shipped, was a party to the bill of lading, either as being on the face of it a contracting party or as being an undisclosed principal of such a party. In either of these cases he might be sued as having been from the beginning a party to the contract. Some attempts had been made to say that the contract in a bill
 G of lading might, under some circumstances at least, be transferred to an assignee in a manner analogous to that in which the contract in a bill of exchange was transferred by the endorsement of the bill of exchange; but I think, since the decision in Thompson v. Dominy (19) in 1845, it has been undisputed law that under no circumstances could anyone, not a party to the contract from the beginning, sue on it in his own name. Any action on the contract at common law must be
 H brought in the name of an original contractor, and no action could be brought on the contract against one who was not liable to be sued as an original contractor.

But ten years later the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, was passed. The preamble states this as one of the objects which the legislature had in view:

"Whereas by the custom of merchants a bill of lading of goods being transferable by endorsement the property in the goods may thereby pass to the endorsee, but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner, and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property."

The mode in which the legislature carry out the object thus expressed in the preamble is by s. 1:

"Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every endorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass, upon or by reason of such consignment or endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

The case made on the statement of claim in the present matter was that "the property" had passed upon or by reason of the endorsement to the defendants, not that they were before that a party to the contract in the bill of lading, but that, by virtue of the Act of 1855, when the property passed they became subject to the same liabilities as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with themselves. It is not disputed that the delivery of the bill of lading to the defendants with the endorsement of the consignee on it in blank was an endorsement, nor that whatever interest then passed to them still remained in them. What was in issue was, whether upon or by reason of that endorsement "the property" passed.

The first and most important question to be decided in this case is: What is the true construction of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855? Does the "property" in the goods there mean any legal property in the goods, so as to be satisfied by proof that a legal property passed accompanied by a right of possession, so as to entitle the transferee to maintain trover, though it was intended by the parties, and was as between them, to be by way of security only, the transferor retaining a right of redemption either by way of a common law retention of the general property, though the pledgee had a right to the possession and a property as pledgee, a right exceeding a lien, or the whole property at law having passed by way of mortgage, the transferor retaining an equity of redemption, which in 1855 was an equitable right, enforceable only in a court of equity? I think that all the judges below were of opinion that, if the right reserved was the general right to the property at law, what was transferred being only a pledge (conveying, no doubt, a right of property and an immediate right to the possession, so that the transferee would be entitled to bring an action at law against anyone who wrongfully interfered with his right), though a property, and a property against the endorser, passed "upon and by reason of the endorsement," yet the property did not pass.

I agree with them. I do not at all proceed on the ground that this, being an endorsement in blank, followed by a delivery of the bill of lading so endorsed, had any different effect from what would have been the effect if it had been an endorsement to the appellants by name. The Freedom (13) was cited, and I think there are expressions used in the judgment delivered in that case by SIR JOSEPH NAPIER which indicate that the Judicial Committee were not of that opinion. It is said (L.R. 3 P.C. at p. 599):

"The plaintiffs were consignees for sale, but as part of the transaction a bill of exchange was drawn by the consignors for nearly the full value of the goods; the bills of lading were endorsed by them and forwarded to the plaintiffs, by whom the draft of the consignors was accepted and paid in due course."

If that was the transaction (and whether it was so or not, the Judicial Committee proceeded on the assumption that such was the transaction), the plaintiffs in The Freedom (13) were in exactly the position of Church in Newsom v. Thornton (20), the case to which I shall have to refer afterwards. Church had the bill of lading endorsed to him as a factor or consignee for sale, and had, therefore, a right to hold the goods as against the endorser as a security for all his advances: and he had authority at common law to sell the goods, and before the arrival of the ship to transfer the bill of lading in furtherance of a sale, but he had no authority to pledge either the goods or the bill of lading. It is true that, by the Factors Acts, the plaintiffs in The Freedom (13) would have had a power, which Church had not, to pledge the bill of lading, but, as they did not exercise that power, it could make no difference. The judgment then proceeds (L.R. 3 P.C. at p. 599):

"The legal title to the property in the goods specified in the bills of lading was thus transferred to and vested in the plaintiffs. The right of suing upon

A the contract in the bills of lading was transferred to them by force of the statute 18 & 19 Vict., c. 111 [Bills of Lading Act, 1855]."

The judgment then proceeds to show, I think correctly, that the dictum of MARTIN, B. (reported in Fox v. Nott (10)), was not necessary for the decision in that case, and goes on:

B "Their Lordships are satisfied that it was intended by this Act that the right of suing upon the contract under a bill of lading should follow the property in the goods therein specified; that is to say, the legal title to the goods as against the endorser."

C It certainly seems to me that their Lordships thought that "the property" passed within the meaning of the Act of 1855 if any legal right to hold as against the endorser passed. The statute which their Lordships had to construe was the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 6 [repealed by Administration of Justice Act, 1920], which is in these terms:

D "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. . . ."

E It is not necessary to put a construction on that section. I think that there are very good reasons for contending that a person who has possession of an endorsed bill of lading without any right at all to hold it against the endorser without being owner of any interest in the goods is not an "assignee" within the meaning of this enactment, and, consequently, that what I understand to be the actual decision of DR. LUSHINGTON in The St. Cloud (21), that such a person could not sue under the Admiralty Court Act, may have been right enough. It is not necessary to decide that. But I agree with what was said in The Nepoter (22), that it is contrary to all rules of construction to interpolate any reference to the Bills of Lading Act into the Admiralty Court Act.

G I think, therefore, that the actual point decided in The Freedom (13) might be quite right, for the plaintiff in that action had a property, and a very substantial property, in the goods as against the endorsers, and everyone else perhaps, and was in every sense an assignee of the bill of lading. The opinion expressed on the construction of the Bills of Lading Act, that in that Act the property meant a legal title as against the endorser, was perhaps unnecessary, and I think not sound. The words used in the statute are not such as prima facie to express such an intention. No one, in ordinary language, would say that when goods are pawned, or money is raised by mortgage on an estate, the property, either in the goods or land, passes to the pledgee or mortgagee, and I cannot think that the object of the enactment was to enact that no security for a loan should be taken on the transfer of bills of lading unless the lender incurred all the liabilities of his borrower on the contract. That would greatly, and I think unnecessarily, hamper the business of advancing money on such securities which the legislature has, by the Factors Acts, shown it thinks ought rather to be encouraged.

I It is not uncommon to reduce into writing the agreement between the banker and his customers as to the terms on which the bills of lading deposited by them as securities are to be held. Such was the case in Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Docks Co. (2), as to which I shall have more to say hereafter. When there is such a writing, it is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive between the parties as to what they intended. And I do not in the least question that such a writing may be so expressed as to show that between the parties the transfer was a mortgage, though of goods, in the manner with which everyone is familiar with regard to lands. The equity of redemption in such a case was an equitable estate only, and in 1855 enforceable in equity, not at law. Where there is neither a symbolical delivery by a transfer of a bill of lading, nor an actual delivery of the goods themselves, there may be (though there seldom is) a substantial difference in the rights of the lender according as the transaction is of the one kind or the other. In Howes v. Ball (23) Ball sold and delivered a coach to John Howes (since deceased) under an agreement in writing, in which there was this clause (7 B. & C. at p. 482):

“And further I, John Howes, do agree that Thomas Ball do have and hold a claim upon the coach until the debt be duly paid.”

John Howes died without having paid the debt. Ball, after his death, seized the coach, for which seizure the action was brought by the executor. Had that agreement amounted to a mortgage by John Howes to Ball, I take it there could have been no doubt that the mortgagee would have had as much right against the executor of John Howes as he would have had against John Howes himself. But it was held that it did not amount to a mortgage, but only to an agreement that Ball should have a right of hypothec, and, there having been no delivery by Howes to Ball, the decision was that, though so long as John Howes lived and held the property in the coach Ball might have justified a seizure as against him, he could not justify a seizure as against his representatives.

In Flory v. Denny (24), where the agreement was it was held to be a mortgage, and to operate so as to transfer the property, without any delivery, as a bargain and sale out and out of the goods would, though an agreement to create a pledge would, according to Howes v. Ball (23) have conveyed no property of any kind in the goods without a delivery. But where the goods are at sea, and there is a transfer of the bill of lading, there is a delivery of possession, symbolical, it is true, but all that can be given. The question whether there was a mortgage or only a common law pledge, or hypothec, it being accompanied by delivery, might affect the question what was the court in which those rights were to be enforced, but does not affect the substance of the rights. The borrower, if ready and willing to pay the money, might in the one case be able to bring an action at law against the lender who refused to allow him to redeem, and in the other have to sue in equity, but as it would equally be a pledge his rights would be the same in substance. I am, therefore, strongly inclined to hold that, even if this was a mortgage, there would not have been a transfer of “the” property within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act. This is contrary to the opinions not only of SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., but of FIELD, J., also. BOWEN, L.J., who agreed with FIELD, J., in thinking that this was not a mortgage but only a pledge, did not express any opinion as to what would have been the law if it had been a mortgage. I believe all the noble and learned Lords who heard the argument are agreed with him in thinking that in this case it was only a pledge. I do not, therefore, intend to express a final decision that an assignee of a bill of lading by way of mortgage is not as such liable to be sued under the Act of 1855, but only to guard against its being supposed that, even if SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., were right in holding this a mortgage, I, as at present advised, should agree in their conclusion that the defendant could be sued.

I now proceed to consider the question on which the Court of Appeal were divided in opinion, but the majority made the order now appealed against. The question is stated by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., to be:

“Does the endorsement of a bill of lading as a security for an advance by a necessary implication which cannot be disproved pass the legal property in the goods named in the bill of lading to the endorsee with an equity in the endorser, the borrower, to redeem the bill of lading by payment or to receive the balance, if any, on a sale?”

- A FIELD, J., had held, and BOWEN, L.J., agreed with him, that it might so operate, if so intended by the parties at the time, but did not so operate if it was intended to be no more than a pledge as distinguished from a mortgage. I do not understand that any one of the judges below disputed that if it was a question of intention depending on the evidence, the finding of FIELD, J., was right; but the majority in the Court of Appeal proceeded on the principles laid down by BRETT, L.J., in
- B Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (2).

In that case the terms on which the bill of lading was delivered to Glyn, Mills & Co. were reduced to writing, and the question, therefore, whether it was intended to deliver it by way of pledge only, or by way of a mortgage, depended on the construction of that writing. Whether BRETT, L.J., thought that on the construction of the written instrument it was intended to be a mortgage, I do not know. I do

C not think he proceeded on that ground. He said it was a mortgage, and that the effect of the Bills of Lading Act was to transfer the right to sue and the liability to be sued to Glyn, Mills & Co. BRAMWELL, L.J., was of an opposite opinion on both points. He thought that Glyn, Mills & Co. had a special property and a right of possession, and no more. In the House of Lords I said (post page 681):

- D “I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on a question much discussed by BRETT, L.J., I mean whether the property which the bankers were to have was the whole legal property in the goods, Cottam & Co.’s interest being equitable only, or whether the bankers were only to have a special property as pawnees, Cottam & Co. having the legal general property. Either way the
- E bankers had a legal property, and at law the right to the possession, subject to the shipowners’ lien, and were entitled to maintain an action against anyone who, without justification or legal excuse, deprived them of that right.”

All the noble and learned Lords agreed in this. I think, therefore, the decision of this House is a strong authority in support of the position which I have before advanced, that the rights of a mortgagee having taken a bill of lading, and the

F rights of a pawnee having taken a bill of lading, are in substance the same. I did not think it necessary to point out that the question which the House in Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (2) had to decide, and did decide, would have been just the same if the Act of 1855 had never been passed, or had been repealed, and consequently that it was unnecessary to express any opinion on the construction of that Act; but it obviously was so.

- G Before proceeding further, I wish to point out what, in my opinion, is a great misapprehension as to the effect of the decision of this House in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), and as to the weight to be given to the opinion of BULLER, J., delivered in this House, and reported in a note to 6 EAST, 20. I have already said that in this case there is no sale, no vendor, and no vendee, and no stoppage in transitu; so that this misapprehension, as I think it is, is not so material as it might be in
- H some other cases. A demurrer on evidence, as is pointed out by EYRE, C.J., in delivering the unanimous opinion of the judges in Gibson v. Hunter (25), not Gibson v. Minet (26), as is by mistake said in the note in 6 EAST, though not familiar in practice, was a proceeding known to the law. He explains it, and states his very confident expectations (which have been justified by the result) that no demurrer on evidence would again be brought before the House. It may be well
- I to point out the dates. The demurrer on evidence in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) was in 1787. The only case of a demurrer on evidence in what were then recent times was Cocksedge v. Fanshawe (27), on which judgment had been given in this House in 1783. Neither in the King’s Bench nor in the Exchequer Chamber was any question raised in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) as to the mode in which the questions discussed were raised. In 1790 the writ of error from the decision of the Exchequer Chamber was brought before the House of Lords. The law peers at that time were LORD THURLOW, LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, and LORD KENYON. When it was argued does not appear, but it was argued, and the same question as had been asked of the judges in Cocksedge v. Fanshawe (27) was asked of the judges. Six judges (including all the survivors of those who had joined in LORD LOUGHBOROUGH's judgment in the Exchequer Chamber) answered in favour of the respondent. The three judges who had given judgment in the King's Bench answered in favour of the appellant. This House delayed giving its opinion till 1793.

In the meantime, in 1791, there was a demurrer to evidence in Gibson v. Hunter (25), which was brought before this House. On Feb. 7, 1793, this House gave judgment awarding a venire de novo. One week afterwards, on Feb. 14, 1793, this House delivered judgment in the long-pending case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), awarding in that case also a venire de novo. LORD LOUGHBOROUGH was himself at that time Lord Chancellor. I should have thought, if anything was clear, it was that this House did not decide anything, except that on that demurrer to the evidence no judgment could be given. Certainly the last conclusion that I should draw is that stated by FIELD, J., that the House in which LORD LOUGHBOROUGH was Lord Chancellor decided, "presumably" on the opinion delivered by BULLER, J., against the judgment of LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, which six judges to three had thought right. Neither can I at all agree in the opinion expressed by FIELD, J., that the opinion of BULLER, J., has always been taken as the law, and been adopted and followed as the law up to the present day. It never was published till 1805, in a note to Newsom v. Thornton (20).

I have for many years been of opinion, and still remain of opinion, that much of what BULLER, J., expresses in that opinion as to stoppage in transitu was peculiar to himself, and was never adopted by any other judge, and is not law at the present day. But it is not necessary to pursue this subject further, as I agree with BOWEN, L.J., that neither the statement of the custom of merchants in the special verdict in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), nor the opinion of BULLER, J., justifies the inference that the endorsement of a bill of lading for a valuable consideration must pass the entire legal property, whatever was the intention of the parties. In Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) Turing was an unpaid vendor to Freeman. He had endorsed the bill of lading to Freeman, and had not, therefore, any right, except that of stopping the goods while in transitu, if Freeman became insolvent without having paid for the goods, and that right he had, though the endorsed bill of lading had been sent on to the vendee, so long as that bill of lading remained in the vendee's hands. But before any such stoppage Freeman, for valuable consideration, endorsed the bill of lading to Lickbarrow, who, whether as mortgagee or pledgee, had a legal property accompanied by a right of possession.

The point which I understand to have been decided in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) was that, on the transfer of the bill of lading to Lickbarrow, the goods ceased to be in transitu, the shipowner from that time no longer holding them as a middleman to carry the goods from the unpaid vendor, Turing, to Freeman, his vendee, but holding them as agent for Lickbarrow. It was held first in Re Westzinthus (3) and then in Spalding v. Ruding (8) that where the transitu was thus put an end to by what was in reality only a pledge, the stoppage might be made available in equity so far as the rights of the pledgee did not extend. I thought, and still think, that the reason why the stoppage could not be made available at law was because the shipowner no longer held the goods as a middleman, as the transferee of the bill of lading for valuable consideration and bona fide, so as to give him a security, whether by way of mortgage or by way of pledge, had a legal property in the goods which he could enforce as against the shipowner. Such being my view of the law, whether it was right or wrong, I expressed myself accordingly in Kemp v. Falk (9), so as to show that I thought so; but there was nothing in that case to call for a decision on the point now before this House.

In Newsom v. Thornton (20) LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., says (6 East. at pp. 40, 41):

"I should be very sorry if anything fell from the court which weakened the authority of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) as to the right of a vendee to pass the

A property of goods in transitu by endorsement of a bill of lading to bona fide holders for a valuable consideration and without notice. For as to Wright v. Campbell (28), though that was the case of an endorsement of a factor, it was an outright assignment of the property for value. Scott, the endorsee, was to sell the goods and indemnify himself out of the produce the amount of the debt for which he had made himself answerable. The factor at least purported to

B make a sale of the goods transferred by the bill of lading, and not a pledge. This was a direct pledge of the bill of lading, and not intended by the parties as a sale. A bill of lading, indeed, shall pass the property upon a bona fide endorsement and delivery where it is intended so to operate, in the same manner as a direct delivery of the goods themselves would do if so intended. But it cannot operate further."

C LAWRENCE, J., says (ibid. at p. 43), speaking of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1):

"All that that case seems to have decided is, that where the property in goods has passed to a vendee, subject only to be divested by the vendor's right to stop them when in transitu, such right must be exercised, if at all, before the vendee has parted with the property to another for a valuable consideration and bona fide, and by endorsement of a bill of lading given him a right to recover them."

D LE BLANC, J., says (ibid. at p. 44), that what they then determine

"will not break in at all on the doctrine of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) that the endorsement of a bill of lading upon the sale of goods will pass the property to a bona fide endorsee, the property being intended to pass by such endorsement."

E In Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (2), BRETT, L.J., speaking of an opinion of WILLES, J., says (6 Q.B.D. at p. 480):

"To say that an endorsement of a bill of lading for an advance is only a pledge, seems to me to be inconsistent with what has always been considered to be the result of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), namely, that such an endorsement passes the legal property."

F By this I understand him to mean the whole legal property. But neither in that case nor in the case now at Bar does he refer to any authority to that effect.

Expressions used by judges have been cited which, I think, only show that they did not carefully consider their language, where no question of the kind before

G us was under discussion. And, as far as I know, there is no decision subsequent to Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) which proceeds on such a ground, while Newsom v. Thornton (20) proceeds expressly on the ground that the endorsement of a bill of lading, when intended to be a pledge only, is not valid if made by one who has no authority to make a pledge. I do not know that I am justified in saying that it is a decision that, if it was made by one who had authority to make a pledge, it would

H be good as such, though I think that appears to have been LORD ELLENBOROUGH's opinion, and I do not think any authority was cited on the argument at the Bar to show that such is not the law. No case was cited at the Bar, nor am I aware of any in which it has been held that a transfer of the bill of lading for value necessarily, whatever might be the intention, passed the whole legal property. SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., says:

I "If the general understanding of merchants had not been in accordance with the verdict of the jury in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1) accepted in its largest sense, there would, one would think, have been cases in the books raising the question."

With submission to him I think no weight can be given to this absence of authority until it is shown that there have been cases in which it became material to consider whether an endorsement intended to be and operating as a pledge at law had a less effect than an endorsement operating against the intention as a mortgage. I have already given my reasons for thinking that in substance the right would be the same. Without, therefore, deciding the question whether a mortgage would render the mortgagee liable under the Bills of Lading Act, I decide that mainly for the reasons given by BOWEN, L.J., this transfer did not operate as a mortgage. I, therefore, am clearly of opinion that the order made by the Court of Appeal should be reversed with costs, and the judgment of FIELD, J., restored.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I concur. This action would not have been maintainable at common law. Is it maintainable under the Bills of Lading Act, 1855? That depends upon whether the appellants are endorsees of the bill of lading

“to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned has passed upon or by reason of such endorsement.”

It is found, as a fact, and rightly found, as is admitted, that all that was intended in the transaction was a pledge. This would give the appellants a property, but, as put by BOWEN, L.J., not “the” property. As I understand SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., if this could be, then the appellants are right; but he thinks it could not be, that Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), or rather BULLER, J.’s judgment shows that, when a bill of lading is endorsed to give any title to the transferee, the entire property is passed, and that in such a case as this nothing but an equitable right to redeem remains in the transferor. It is for those who assert this to prove it. I cannot prove the negative that it is not so, and logically and reasonably I might content myself with saying that it is not proved to me—that I see no reason and no authority in support of it. But I go further. I think that authority and reason are against it.

I will not discuss or examine the cases. They do not, in my opinion, justify the contention. I will not examine them in detail. That has been done by the Lord Chancellor. I understand his conclusion to be that the expressions of the learned judges which have been relied upon should be read and interpreted secundum subjectam materiam. I agree. In no case has the present matter been under consideration. As to the reason and principle which should govern, I ask: Why should the transfer of the bill of lading have a greater effect, contrary to the parties’ intention, than the handing over of the chattels themselves would have? They could be pledged if on shore, but, being at sea, no actual delivery, which is necessary to a common law pledge, can take place. There can, however, be a symbolical delivery by transferring the bill of lading. Why should the effect be different?

Consider the inconvenience of holding that the pledgor has only an equitable right; that he may repay the loan at the day appointed, but thereby acquire no legal title to the possession of the goods; that the pledgee may sell and pass the entire property to one not having notice of the equitable title. Consider what difficulties would be put on those who lend on such securities if this action was maintainable. The banker who lent money on a bill of lading for goods which arrived in specie, but damaged by perils of the seas so as to be worthless, might lose the money lent and the freight. Another consequence would be that the transferee of the bill of lading, though only interested to the amount of the loan on it, would be the person to bring actions on the contract to carry. It is true that, unless he can do so in all cases, he can in none, even where his interest is to the extent of the full value of the goods. Either this was not thought of by the legislature, or, if it was, they thought that no case could be included unless all were, and that it was better to include none than all. It is to be observed that the statute in its preamble says that by endorsement the property “may” pass. It is to be remembered also, as pointed out by my Lord Chancellor, that this law bears upon foreigners out of the kingdom. I am the more surprised at this contention on the part of SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., as he has always so ably and powerfully contended that mercantile laws, contracts, and usages should be as free as possible from technicality.

A I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. I cannot truly say that I have any doubt on the matter. I take this opportunity of saying that I think there is some inaccuracy of expression in the statute. It recites that,

B The truth is that the property does not pass by the endorsement but by the contract in pursuance of which the endorsement is made. If a cargo afloat is sold, the property would pass to the vendee, even though the bill of lading was not endorsed. I do not say that the vendor might not retain a lien, nor that the non-endorsement and non-handing over of the bill of lading would not have certain other consequences. My concern is to show that the property passes by the contract. So if the contract was one of pledge, the property would be bound by the contract, at least, as to all who had notice of it, though the bill of lading was not handed over. There is, I think, another inaccuracy in the statute, which indeed is universal. It speaks of the contract contained in the bill of lading. To my mind, there is no contract in it. It is a receipt for the goods, stating the terms on which they were delivered to and received by the ship, and, therefore, excellent evidence of those terms, but it is not a contract. That has been made before the bill of lading was given. Take, for instance, goods shipped under a charterparty, and a bill of lading differing from the charterparty, as between shipowner and shipper at least the charterparty is binding: Gledstanes v. Allen (29). These distinctions are of a verbal character and not perhaps of much consequence, but I am strongly of opinion that precision of expression is very desirable, and had it existed in such cases as the present there would not have been the contradictory opinions which have been given.

E

LORD FITZGERALD.—FIELD, J., in the court below came to the conclusion that the transaction under investigation was intended by the parties to operate as a pledge only. There can be no doubt that the inference thus drawn by the learned judge was correct in fact. It seems to follow that the pledgees acquired a special property in the goods with a right to take actual possession should it be necessary to do so, for their protection or for the realisation of their security. They acquired no more, and subject thereto the general property remained in the pledgor. I am of opinion that the delivery of the endorsed bill of lading to the defendants as a security for their advance did not by necessary implication transfer the property in the goods to the defendants. They were not, therefore, endorsees of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods passed by reason of the endorsement, so as to make them, without more,

SMITH v. CHADWICK AND OTHERS

[House of Lords (the Earl of Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn, Lord Watson and Lord Bramwell), November 15, 16, 21, 22, 23, 1883, February 18, 1884]

48 J.P. 644; 32 W.R. 687]

Deceit—Evidence—Need to prove actual fraud which was inducing cause to contract, and damage—Need to call plaintiff as witness—Relevance of motive of defendant.

To succeed in an action for deceit by which the plaintiff was induced to enter into a contract the plaintiff must establish (i) actual fraud, which is to be judged of by the nature and character of the representations made, considered with reference to the object with which they were made, the knowledge or means of knowledge of the person making them, and the intention which the law justly imputes to every man to produce those consequences which are the natural result of his acts; (ii) that this fraud was an inducing cause to the contract, for which purpose it must be material, and it must have produced in his mind an erroneous belief, influencing his conduct; and (iii) damage.

Per LORD BLACKBURN: As to what is sufficient proof of damage, I do not think it is necessary that the plaintiff always should be called as a witness to swear that he acted on the inducement. If it is proved that the defendants, with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract, made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into a contract, and it is proved that the plaintiff did enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement. The weight of this evidence must greatly depend on the degree to which the action of the plaintiff was likely, and on the absence of all other ground on which the plaintiff might act. If the plaintiff is not called, or, being called, does not swear that he was induced, it adds much weight to the doubts whether the inference was a true one. . . . As a matter of law the motive of the person saying that which he knows not to be true to another, with the intention to lead him to act on the faith of the statement is immaterial.

B Appeal by the plaintiff in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ.), reported 20 Ch.D. 27, reversing a decision of FRY, J., in an action brought by William Smith, a steel manufacturer, against D. Chadwick, J. O. Chadwick, E. Adamson, and E. Collier, accountants, for damages alleged to have been sustained by him by his having been induced to take and pay for shares in the Blochairn Iron Co., Ltd., by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants.

C The company was formed in the early part of 1873 for the purpose of purchasing from Messrs. Hannay & Son the Blochairn Iron Works, near Glasgow, and also the Nether Johnstone Colliery, which Messrs. Hannay were under contract to purchase. The alleged misrepresentations were contained in a prospectus dated May 27, 1873, signed by the defendants, and in a circular letter from them, bearing the same date, which accompanied it. The prospectus contained the name of Mr. James J. Grieve, M.P. for Greenock, as a director, and stated that the value of the property amounted to £301,000; that that of the stocks and working capital might be estimated to be £200,000; that there had been no addition for goodwill; that the company's works were capable of producing 75,000 tons per annum; that the "present value of the turnover or output" of the works was over £1,000,000 per annum; and that the land on which the works stood was about seventeen acres, and was held in perpetuity, subject to a reasonable ground-rent. In the circular letter which accompanied this prospectus the defendants said:

"We have much confidence in recommending this investment to our friends, and request to be favoured with your early application."

F On June 4, 1873, the plaintiff sent in an application for one hundred £50 shares in the company, on the faith, as he alleged, of the statements in the prospectus, and he eventually paid £5,000 in respect of them. On July 25, 1874, the company being unsuccessful, a resolution was passed for winding it up voluntarily. On May 5, 1876, the plaintiff brought the present action against Messrs. Chadwick, claiming £5,750 as damages sustained by him by having been induced to take shares in the company by their fraudulent misrepresentations, the alleged misrepresentations being that Mr. Grieve was untruly stated to be a director of the company, that the prospectus did not mention that interest was to be paid on the instalments of the purchase-money, that the plaintiff was led to believe that the goodwill was valuable whereas it was valueless, that the production and output or turnover were falsely stated, and that the valuation of the land related to twenty acres, whereas the company only obtained seventeen acres. It appeared that Mr. Grieve had originally consented to become a director, and that he had been requested to sign the memorandum and articles of association, but had telegraphed in reply:

"Your movements are too rapid for me. Cannot conclude finally till I hear from Mr. Morton tomorrow regarding necessary inquiries."

I The defendants, however, expecting that the answer of Mr. Morton, who was himself a director, would be satisfactory, issued the prospectus without striking out Mr. Grieve's name. The plaintiff admitted that he had never heard of Mr. Grieve before, and when asked whether the name had any effect in inducing him to join the company, shook his head. It was proved that the money received by the company in the year 1872 was only £365,000, and that in 1873 it was less than half that amount, while the output was nothing like the amount stated. FRY, J., came to the conclusion, on these facts, that the prospectus contained such misrepresentations as entitled the plaintiff to recover. The Court of Appeal, however, reversed his decision, the learned judges expressing their belief that the defendants were honest men, and had not been guilty of fraud, but merely of carelessness in some matters, and that the plaintiff, not having been induced to take the shares by reason of Mr. Grieve being stated to be a director, was not entitled to base his claim upon that erroneous statement. From that decision the plaintiff appealed. A

Feb. 18, 1884. The following opinions were read. C

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—I conceive that in an action of deceit like the present, it is the duty of the plaintiff to establish two things—first, actual fraud, which is to be judged of by the nature and character of the representations made, considered with reference to the object with which they were made, the knowledge or means of knowledge of the person making them, and the intention which the law justly imputes to every man to produce those consequences which are the natural result of his acts; and, secondly, he must establish that this fraud was an inducing cause to the contract, for which purpose it must be material, and it must have produced in his mind an erroneous belief, influencing his conduct. D

All your Lordships are, I believe, agreed in thinking that, of the several representations in this prospectus, by which the appellant alleges himself to have been deceived, only one is material, viz., that as to "the present value of the turnover or output of the entire works" (stated as being over "£1,000,000 sterling per annum"). Of the materiality of that representation there can be no doubt; and if the appellant was justified in understanding, and did understand it, in the sense insisted upon by his counsel at the Bar, it was untrue as well as material. If, in the context in which it stands, it could not be honestly intended or reasonably understood in any other sense, I should think that the appellant's case was made out, although he has contented himself with swearing, in his answer to the defendant's interrogatories, that he understood the meaning of the words to be "that which they obviously convey," and has professed to be "unable to express in other words, what he understood to be the meaning thereof." If, for instance, the material statement had been that Mr. Grieve was a director, I should have thought such an answer quite sufficient. But it is otherwise, in my opinion, if the words in the context in which they stand may have been honestly intended to bear another sense (in which they would be true), and might probably and reasonably have been so understood by an intelligent man of business, aware of the current prices at that time of bar and plate iron, and if, at the time when that answer was given, the appellant had notice that the respondents, who made the representation, did in fact allege such other sense to be the true one, and the sense which they themselves intended. E F G H

The sentence is, beyond question, unhappily expressed, and I think its more natural prima facie meaning is that which takes the verb "is" literally, as affirming a present fact, and the words "the present value of the turnover or output" as equivalent to "the present value of the present turnover or output." I cannot, however, consider the words in the context in which they stand to be clear or unambiguous. In any point of view I do not think that they sufficiently explain themselves. Some reference, at least, I to current prices, as a basis of valuation, must be implied in them. Even on the appellant's construction, "the turnover or output" is a term requiring some further definition. Does it mean the rate of production then actually going on, if extended over a whole year, or the total production of the past twelve months, estimated at the then present prices, or the actual yearly production on a series or an average of years? If the demonstrative article "this" had preceded the words "turnover or output" (instead of the definite article "the"), the sense would clearly be that which the respondents say they intended.

- A After repeatedly considering the words in connection with their context and with the evidence, I think the soundest conclusion is that this sentence was honestly intended to be understood as a statement of the value, at the then current prices, of that "turnover or output" of which the works were in the immediately preceding context stated to be "capable," and that, to an intelligent man of business, who knew what those current prices actually were, and who took the trouble of comparing them with the figures given, they would really convey that meaning. The appellant was an intelligent man of business, and it does not appear to me to be a hypothesis inconsistent with anything to which he has sworn, that he may have had the requisite knowledge, and may have made use of it, and may have himself understood the representation in this sense, and have intended (in that sense) to challenge its truth. He did expressly challenge the truth of part of the representation, in the antecedent context, as to the capacity of the works. That the respondents would offer that explanation of it, he had (to my mind) clear notice, by their answers to his interrogatories, sworn or filed on June 12, 1877.

- D Having such notice, and afterwards answering the respondents' interrogatories in the way that he did, and not attempting in any other way to prove that he was deceived by the representation, I cannot think that he has satisfied the burden of proof, which, under these circumstances, was incumbent upon him. The Court of Appeal have so decided; I cannot say that they were wrong. It ought not to be forgotten that the appellant has sworn in precisely the same way as to all the representations which in his pleadings he alleges to be false, as to some of which your Lordships do not accept his construction, and as to others of which it is certain that he was not deceived by, and did not rely on, them. I do not think it necessary to add more, because I agree generally with that view of this case, which I know will be explained to your Lordships in greater detail by LORD BLACKBURN. My conclusion is that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

- F LORD BLACKBURN.—In this case FRY, J., who tried the action, gave judgment for the plaintiff, and ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff should recover £5,000 by way of damages, and that the defendants, David Chadwick, John Oldfield Chadwick, Ebenezer Adamson, and Edwin Collier, should pay the same. The defendants David and J. O. Chadwick and Edwin Collier appealed, and the defendant Adamson separately appealed. In each case the Court of Appeal, consisting of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ., made an order reversing the judgment and dismissing the action with costs. The appeal to your Lordships is against those two orders. It is not contended that there is any room for a distinction between the cases. If the order reversing the judgment against one set of defendants is right, the order to reverse the judgment against the other is also right.

- The action is brought in the Chancery Division, the endorsement on the writ being that

- H "the plaintiff's claim is for damages sustained by him by his having been induced to take and pay for shares in the Blochairn Iron Co., Ltd., by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants."

- The statement of claim does not depart at all from this, though stating it at more length. I agree in what is said by COTTON, L.J., in Arkwright v. Newbold (1) I (17 Ch.D. at p. 320):

"An action of deceit is a common law action, and must be decided on the same principles, whether it be brought in the Chancery Division, or any of the Common Law Divisions, there being, in my opinion, no such thing as an equitable action for deceit."

But though this is, I think, quite accurate, the different mode in which cases are tried makes, I think, a difference in the province of a Court of Appeal which I wish to notice, for, in the view I take of this case, it is important. Had this action been brought on the old system, before a judge and a jury, and the same evidence given as has been given here, the judge would have had to direct the jury, pointing out to them what it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove in order to support his case, and what evidence there was from which an inference of fact, sufficient to support the plaintiff's case, might be drawn, leaving it to the jury, with proper comment, to draw, or refuse to draw, that inference. And if the jury had found for the plaintiff, on a proper application on behalf of the defendant, a Court of Appeal could have inquired whether the proper direction was given, and, if it was, whether the verdict drawing the inference was so unsatisfactory that a new trial should be granted and the opinion of another jury taken. But the Court of Appeal, however strongly convinced that the jury drew the wrong inference, could not find the verdict for the defendant. A B

When the case is, as it was here, tried before a judge both of law and of fact, he draws the inference of fact. If he finds in favour of the defendant, it may be because he thinks the evidence such that, as a matter of law, no inference of what was necessary to support the plaintiff's case could properly be drawn from the evidence before him, or it may be because, though he thinks such an inference might be drawn, he does not, as a matter of fact, draw it. The result would be the same. If he finds in favour of the plaintiff, it must be because he not only thinks that an inference might be drawn from the evidence, but that he does draw it. The Court of Appeal ought to give great weight, but not undue weight, to the opinion of the judge who tried the cause and saw the witnesses and their demeanour. That gives him considerable advantages over those who only draw their information from perusing the notes. But still, though the Court of Appeal ought not lightly to find against the opinion of the judge who tried the cause, I think that the Court of Appeal, if convinced that the inference in favour of the plaintiff ought not to have been drawn from the evidence, should find the verdict the other way. C D E

In the present case, I think there were four statements by the defendants, alleged to be fraudulent, and to have induced the plaintiff to buy the shares, on which the finding of the judge below, in favour of the plaintiff, was based. Two were disposed of in the course of the argument; two remain. One, that which stated that Mr. Grieve was a director, was, I think, proved to be untrue to the knowledge of the defendants when they made it, and anyone who took shares, induced by the belief that Mr. Grieve would not lend his name to a company without ascertaining that it was a solid one, would, I think, be entitled to maintain an action of deceit. I can very well believe that there might be persons in Greenock or elsewhere who would be influenced by his name to that extent. But the plaintiff, in his evidence on cross-examination, says that he had never heard of Mr. Grieve before, and on the counsel saying: "Then, I suppose, seeing Mr. Grieve's name on the prospectus had not much effect on you," he said nothing, but we are informed that he shook his head, and it is plain that the cross-examining counsel was satisfied with this mute answer, and on re-examination nothing is said more about Mr. Grieve. F G

I think it proved that the plaintiff was not induced to take the shares by this deceit. And I believe all your Lordships agree so far. But there is a much more difficult question depending upon the confused statement as to the turnover and output, which I will examine more in detail afterwards. I have come to the conclusion that, whatever be the meaning of that statement, the plaintiff has not sufficiently proved that it did influence him. I do not say that there is no evidence on which a verdict for the plaintiff might be found. I certainly think that, if trying this cause with a jury, I should not be justified in withdrawing it from the jury. I do not even say that a verdict for the plaintiff, if found by a jury, would be so unsatisfactory that there should be a new trial. But I should have accompanied my direction to the jury with the same observations which I shall hereafter submit to your Lordships as justifying the conclusion to which the Court of Appeal have come and to which I myself come, and to which I ask your Lordships to come, and I think that the jury would, on hearing them, have probably found for the defendants. H I

- A Before going further, I wish to make some observations, for, though I very nearly agree in what is said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., he does not quite state what I conceive to be the law. I do not mean to go through the numerous decisions on the subject of an action of deceit. All those which were decided before the date of the last edition of SMITH'S LEADING CASES [8th Edn., 1879] are to be found collected in the notes there to Chandelor v. Lopus (2) and Pasley v. Freeman (3).
- B In Pasley v. Freeman (3) BULLER, J., says (3 Term Rep. at p. 56):

"The foundation of this action is fraud and deceit in the defendant and damage to the plaintiffs. And the question is whether an action thus founded can be sustained in a court of law. Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but where these two concur an action lies per CROKE, J., 3 BULSTRODE'S REPORTS, p. 95."

- C Whatever difficulties there may be as to defining what is fraud and deceit, I think no one will venture to dispute that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he proves damage. In an ordinary action of deceit the plaintiff alleges that false and fraudulent representations were made by the defendant to the plaintiff in order to induce him, the plaintiff, to act upon them. I think that if he did act upon these representations, he shows damage; if he did not, he shows none. And I think the plaintiff
- D in such a case must not only allege but prove this damage.

It is as to what is sufficient proof of this damage that I wish to make my remarks. I do not think it is necessary, in order to prove this, that the plaintiff always should be called as a witness to swear that he acted upon the inducement. At the time when Pasley v. Freeman (3) was decided, and for many years afterwards, he could not be so called. I think that if it is proved that the defendants, with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract, made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into a contract, and it is proved that the plaintiff did enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement. In Redgrave v. Hurd (4), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., is reported to have said it was an inference of law. If he really meant this, he retracts it in his observations in the present case. I think it not possible to maintain that it is an inference of law. Its weight as evidence must greatly depend upon the degree to which the action of the plaintiff was likely, and on the absence of all other grounds on which the plaintiff might act. I quite agree that, being a fair inference of fact, it forms evidence proper to be left to a jury as proof that he was so induced. But I do not think that it would be a proper direction to tell a jury that, if convinced that there was such a material representation, they ought to find that the plaintiff was induced by it, unless one of the things which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., specified (ante p. 79) was proved*, nor do I think he meant to say so. I think there are a great many other things which might make it a fair question for the jury whether the evidence on which they might draw the inference was of such weight that they would draw the inference. And, whenever that is a matter of doubt, I think the tribunal which

H has to decide the fact should remember that now, and for some years past, the plaintiff can be called as a witness on his own behalf; and that, if he is not so called, or, being so called, does not swear that he was induced, it adds much weight to the doubts whether the inference was a true one. I do not say it is conclusive.

The principal facts in the present case are not now much in controversy. The defendants were employed by Messrs. Hannay & Co. to assist in getting up a limited company to take over their works, and they were to receive a commission (amounting to some thousands of pounds) if they succeeded in floating such a limited company. They prepared a prospectus, and on May 27, 1873, circulated that prospectus with a lithographed letter. On May 31, 1873, the defendants circulated a second letter with what is called an abridged prospectus. Pausing here,

I

* I.e., (i) that the plaintiff knew the facts before he entered into the contract, and, therefore, could not rely on the mis-statements or (ii) that he avowedly did not rely on them, whether he knew the facts or not.

I may say that I do not think it can admit of dispute that the defendants intended A by those letters and prospectus to induce those to whom they sent them to apply for shares in the projected limited company. Among others, they sent them to the plaintiff. He was not a customer or client of the defendants (I do not know that it would have made any difference if he had been), but he was a man of business, who had himself turned his own business into a limited company, and had taken shares in other companies and was quite competent to form an opinion B for himself. He was, however, in my opinion, entitled to consider the letters and prospectus as amounting to a representation to him that all stated in that prospectus was true. He did, a day or two after receiving the second letter and the abridged prospectus, apply for 100 shares, expecting, as he says, that he might get 20, but the whole 100 were allotted to him. He paid the calls, amounting to £5,000 and, the limited company having completely failed, he lost the whole; C and if he is entitled to recover on the ground that he was by fraudulent representations induced to take the shares, he is entitled to recover £5,000 as damages.
Nothing that happened after he applied for the shares could have had a part in inducing him to apply for them, and, therefore, I think that the circular subsequently issued by the defendants can have no bearing on this part of the case, whatever bearing it may have on other questions.

I now proceed to state why I think that the finding that the plaintiff was induced D to buy the shares by that passage relating to the turnover and output cannot be supported. The passage is short:

"The iron works are the largest and most important in Scotland and have been equipped in a substantial, complete, and permanent manner. They can now produce at the rate of 1,500 tons of finished bars and plates per week, E or about 75,000 tons per annum. The rolling mills with some slight alterations, will be capable of turning out 90,000 tons of manufactured iron per annum.
The present value of the turnover or output of the entire works is over one million sterling per annum."

As early as June 12, 1877, the defendants, in answer to an interrogatory, showed, F in my opinion, what they at that time said was the meaning of this very obscure passage. They swore as follows:

"The then value of the annual turnover or output of the works is a necessary arithmetical result from the amount of the weekly productiveness, of which the particulars are given by the last preceding paragraph, taken in connection with the then existing average prices, after allowing reasonable deductions for short working, defects, and casualties. The current price in Glasgow of bars and rails in May, 1873, was £13 10s. per ton, of nail rods £15 10s. per ton, of hoops G £17 per ton, and of sheets £20 per ton. Taking a mean of only £15 per ton on 1,500 tons per week, and allowing only 50 weeks in the year, the value of the year's turnover or output would be £1,125,000."

The defendants interrogated the plaintiff, requiring him H "as to each and every of the allegations of misrepresentations contained in the statement of claim," to separately and categorically state, firstly, what he understood to be the meaning of the particular representation; thirdly, "in what respect or respects he now alleges that every or any of the said representations were untrue."

On Jan. 23, 1878, seven months and more after the defendant's answer, which I I have read, the plaintiff answers thus:

"Firstly, I understood the meaning of such misrepresentations respectively to be that which the words composing them obviously convey, and I am unable to express in any other words what I understood to be the meaning thereof. . .
Thirdly, I allege that such misrepresentations are untrue in the manner and respects appearing in the said statement of claim, and I have nothing to add to, or detract from, the said statement of claim."

- A It is said that the plaintiff could not say more than that he understood the words in their natural sense. I think that his legal advisers had notice ever since June 12, 1877, if not before, that the defendants contended that the meaning of this obscure phrase was that, at the then present prices of bars and plates, 75,000 tons would be worth more than a million. So understood, the representation was true. This meaning is one at least so plausible that COTTON, L.J., thought it the right meaning.
- B If the statement as to prices at the date of the prospectus had been inserted in it so as to make it read thus: "The current price of bars is now £13 10s. per ton, of plates £15 to £20 per ton, according to their quality; so that, assuming the proportion of bars to plates not to be unreasonably large, the mean price of bars and plates is more than £13 6s. 8d. The present value of the turnover," etc., I think that a reasonable man would have probably thought that the meaning was
- C that put upon it in the defendants' answer to the interrogatories, or, at least, would not have acted, without some further inquiry, on the belief that it meant something else. It is quite true that those prices are not stated on the face of the prospectus, and though the plaintiff, being himself engaged in a branch of the iron trade, was not unlikely to know what those prices were, I do not find it anywhere asserted that he knew them; but it is nowhere, that I can find, asserted that he did not
- D know them.

- I cannot myself see what difficulty there could have been in saying, in answer to the defendants' interrogatory: "I understand the meaning of the representation as to turnover to be that Messrs. Hannays' works had actually during the past year turned out produce that at present prices would be worth more than a million; and that was untrue, for they never produced half as much." When I say this,
- E I mean of course if the plaintiff could truly swear to that effect. If he did not so understand it, there was of course a very good reason for not so swearing. It is true that the answers to interrogatories are prepared by the legal advisers, and the plaintiff, if at the trial he had sworn: "I did so understand it," had been asked, "Then, if so, why did you not say so in January, 1878?" might have had an excuse by saying, "I swore what was true, and if I should have sworn more, that was my
- F lawyer's fault, not mine." But he never at any time, from first to last, swears anything of the sort, and I think it is impossible now to listen to the suggestion that the counsel for the plaintiff, at the trial in November, 1881, were taken by surprise at finding that the defendant's counsel still put on this passage the interpretation which had been put upon it in the answer to the interrogatories so long ago as June, 1877. If they were surprised, they had no right to be so. But I
- G think the fair conclusion is that they feared to ask the question in examining the plaintiff in chief lest he should answer that he did not understand the prospectus as meaning that there had been an actual output during the last year, or at least that he would not swear that he was influenced by his belief in that statement. Counsel for the defendants did not choose, on cross-examination, to risk bringing out of a hostile witness evidence which his own counsel had not brought out in
- H chief. If I am right in the opinion which I have already expressed, that the burden lay on the plaintiff to prove that he was induced, I think they acted wisely. If the plaintiff had made a prima facie case which required affirmative proof of an answer from the defendants, I think it would be otherwise.

- It will be observed that this opinion is quite irrespective of what the true construction of the prospectus is. I should think that a reasonable man would give much
- I more weight to a statement of fact that the actual produce of the works had been so much than to a statement that their productive power was estimated at so much, and, therefore, that the statement, if understood as FRY, J., and LINDLEY, L.J., and I believe some of your Lordships think, was material. I should think that a reasonable man reading this prospectus would hardly act on the faith of such an obscure statement without further inquiry. But he might so act. My reason for supporting the judgment of the Court of Appeal is that I do not think it proved that he did so act. In the case of the mis-statement as to Mr. Grieve being a director, I think it positively proved that he did not.

I may say, though it is not necessary for the decision of the case, that I think, A as a matter of law, the motive of the person saying that which he knows not to be true to another, with the intention to lead him to act on the faith of the statement, is immaterial. The defendants might honestly believe that the shares were a capital investment, and that they were doing the plaintiff a kindness by tricking him into buying them. I do not say this is proved, but if it were—if they did trick him into doing so—they are civilly responsible as for a deceit. And if, with intent to B lead the plaintiff to act upon it, they put forth a statement which they know may bear two meanings—one of which is false to their knowledge—and thereby the plaintiff, putting that meaning on it, is misled, I do not think they can escape by saying he ought to have put the other. If they palter with him in a double sense, it may be that they lie like truth; but I think they lie, and it is a fraud.
Indeed, as a question of casuistry, I am inclined to think the fraud is aggravated C by a shabby attempt to get the benefit of a fraud without incurring the responsibility.
But I do not think there is any case made out against the defendants of that sort.

There is a third possible case, that a man may make a statement which he intended to mean one thing only, but which negligently and stupidly he sends out in such a shape as to bear another meaning, and the plaintiff acts upon that meaning. On that I need only say that the defendant, in such a case, would have great difficulty in establishing that it was only honest blundering; but if he did, as for instance, by showing that his manuscript sent to the printer contained the word "not," which by some printer's error was omitted in the published prospectus, or that 10,000 was, by a printer's error, printed 100,000, which escaped notice in revising the proofs, I should say it was not a fraud, though perhaps gross negligence. But the question whether in such a case there would be any, and if any D what, remedy for the party misled, may, I think, safely be left for decision when it arises. It never has arisen, and I think it not likely ever to arise. It certainly does not arise now. E

LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am content that your Lordships' judgment should be F as indicated by the noble and learned Lords who have spoken; but I am not content with the reasons they have given. It seems to me that the prospectus is capable of but one meaning. I know, as a matter of fact, that a most able and acute mind has said that it was capable of a different meaning from that which I think it is alone capable of, but what I mean is that, according to my understanding, this part of the prospectus—the main matter—that which alone is of any consequence, G is capable of but one meaning, namely, that the actual output was a million a year, or I think over a million a year. I quite agree with the LORD CHANCELLOR, who has said that it may mean one or other of two things; it may mean that the actual output was at that rate, or that it had come to over that figure in a year.
But that either it was at the rate of over one million a year, or was in fact over one million a year, seems to me the only meaning that can be attached to that state- H ment in the prospectus.

If that was the meaning of it, that statement was untrue, because there neither was an output at that rate, nor was there an output actually of over a million a year. Further, I think the plaintiff said that he so understood it. It was unfortunate that he was not more examined or more cross-examined, but I declare the man gave the only answer I could have given if I had been in his situation: I "I understood it according to its natural meaning." I do not see what more he could do, and it seems to me impossible to suppose that he was saying: "I understood it to mean that fifteen times £75,000 came to over one million," because that he knew perfectly well, and everybody else knew; and if his answer is understood as meaning that, his answer is understood as meaning: "I make no complaint of untruth in it, because it simply comes to this, that £75,000 multiplied by fifteen is over one million." It seems to me, therefore, that the statement was untrue:
that it was understood in the sense in which it was untrue, and consequently that

- A the plaintiff proved all that he could prove, the only other possible question being one of inference to a certain extent, namely, was it fraudulent? I confess that upon that matter I have entertained the very greatest doubt, and do entertain the greatest doubt. Assuming that the statement means that the actual turnout was over one million a year, or at the rate of over one million a year, and assuming
- B that was a fraudulent statement on the part of the defendants. I am not satisfied that it was, and I will shortly state my reasons for not being satisfied that it was. I cannot but think that the defence which has been made for the defendants is one they would not have made for themselves if they had been let alone. I think it is their counsel's defence. I cannot see that it is their defence, because the defendants state that they were told by Hannays, who were respectable—people
- C to be trusted—that the actual rate of production was such that it was over one million a year. They have sworn that they were told so and that they believed it, and, in addition to that, one of them has given the convincing proof of his sincerity that he staked £5,000 upon it, which he has lost. I am not satisfied that that man was telling an untruth; I cannot be satisfied of it. I cannot but think it was a most reckless prospectus, and certainly, with regard to the statement about Mr.
- D Grieve being a director, when they issued it they knew that was untrue, which throws a great suspicion on the case. But I am not satisfied, and I cannot be satisfied, that these men were wilfully making a statement which they knew to be untrue. They have sworn that they had the information from Hannays, and that they believed it.

- Under these circumstances I am not dissatisfied that your Lordships should
- E affirm the judgment that has been given in their favour. If the question here had been whether they should be in any way punished for a most improvident and rash number of statements (more than one) in the prospectus, I should have been very much inclined to say "yes"; but I am not sure that I should have gone beyond the £5,000 which they have been fined. But that is not the question. The question is whether we are satisfied that it was a fraudulent as well as what it
- F was, to my mind, an untrue, statement. I am not satisfied of that. I confess I should very much have liked, if it had been a possible thing, to have tried this case over again. I hope I shall not be misunderstood as suggesting that I could have tried it better than anybody else, but I should like to have been present at the trial and to have had an opportunity of putting some questions to the witnesses, both the plaintiff's and the defendants' which it seems to me might very properly
- G and usefully have been put. But that is an impossibility. We must either, as I understand it, affirm the judgment or reverse it, and I am not so satisfied, as I have said, that a fraud has been made out against these defendants that I am content to reverse it.

Appeal dismissed.

EARL DE LA WARR v. MILES AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (James, Brett and Cotton, L.JJ.), February 5, 7, March 14, 15, 18, 19, 21, April 4, 1881]

Commons—Common—Right of—Acquirement by prescription—Evidence—Acts done as right in respect of tenement owned by claimant—Continuous exercise.

Section 1 of the Prescription Act, 1832, provides that on a claim to any right of common, made by custom, prescription, or grant, when such right, profit, or benefit shall have been taken and enjoyed without interruption by the person claiming the right for the full period of sixty years, the right shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible unless it was enjoyed by consent.

To bring himself within the section the person claiming the right must show that the acts which he claims a right to do are such as could be supported as lawful by custom or prescription, or could have been lawfully granted to him, and that the acts which he has done in purported exercise of the right were done as of right, i.e., not secretly, not as acts of violence, and not under permission from time to time given by the person on whose soil the acts were done. It must also be shown that the acts were done in respect of some tenement owned either by the claimant or by him and his predecessors in title; that the period of prescription relied on began at a certain time; and that the right claimed, if it is capable of being so exercised, has been exercised from year to year from that time to the beginning of the action. The fact that other persons in the same circumstances as the claimant to the right make the same claim will not derogate from his special right.

By a decree of the Duchy Court of Lancaster in 1693, in a friendly suit for the establishment of the respective rights of the lord and the commoners in a former royal forest, the commoners were declared entitled, in respect of their tenements, to the sole common pasturage and herbage in 6,400 acres of the forest thereby set apart to meet the requirements of the commoners.

Held: the decree gave to the commoners the ordinary right of common of pasturage or herbage only, and, the decree being unambiguous in its terms, evidence that for upwards of sixty years past the commoners had exercised the supposed right of cutting and carrying away for use on their tenements brakes, fern, heather, and other litter, was not admissible to show that such a right was intended to be recognised by the decree.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of BACON, V.-C., in an action brought by Earl De la Warr, as lord of the manor of Duddleswell and tenant for life of Ashdown forest in Sussex, against the defendant John Miles in respect of an alleged trespass committed by him under the instructions of his employer the defendant Bernard Hale, in cutting and carrying away heather and litter from part of the waste lands of the forest.

The forest, containing 13,991 acres, was anciently a royal forest belonging to the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster, which in 1661 King Charles II disafforested, and in 1677 granted to the plaintiff's predecessors in title. The defendant Hale in his statement of defence, after stating that the tenants of the manors of Maresfield and Duddleswell, both freehold and copyhold, were with reference to their common rights over the forest called "free tenants," the tenants of other manors near "foreign tenants," and persons holding both descriptions of land "inter-tenants," justified the trespass, stating (i) in para. 10 of his statement of defence, that "the said free tenants, foreign tenants, and inter-tenants, had and exercised as of right and without interruption previously to the year 1693, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, the several and respective rights of common in and over the said 13,991 acres which they enjoyed, or to which they were entitled as aforesaid"; (ii) in para. 2, that, under a decree in the Duchy Court in 1693, it was decided that the complainants (the predecessor in title of Lord De la Warr), their heirs and assigns, owners and proprietors of the soil of the said forest, should for ever hold and enjoy certain lands amounting to about 7,591 acres of the forest to be inclosed or improved by them, and that the defendants (through one of whom, John Day, the present defendant Bernard Hale derived title) should be for ever excluded from having or claiming any common pasturage, pannage, or herbage within the 7,591 acres so allotted to the complainants), and that the defendants, their heirs, tenants, and assigns, and all other persons having right of common in the said forest according to their respective interests therein, should from time to time have and take the sole

- A common pasturage and herbage of the remaining 6,400 acres of the forest, and that the complainants, their heirs and assigns, tenants and farmers, should be for ever excluded from having or claiming any common of pasture or herbage upon or in the said 6,400 acres so left for common as aforesaid; (iii) in para. 13, that, since the year 1693, the said John Day, and the other commoners, and their heirs, successors, and assigns, had taken and enjoyed, by themselves or their
- B tenants, in, over, and from the aforesaid 6,400 acres, the sole common pasturage and herbage, including the brakes, fern, heather, and litter growing in and upon the said 6,400 acres, and their rights had been recognised by all owners of the forest until the present Lord De la Warr disputed them; (iv) in para. 15, that the defendant Hale and Charlotte Cecilia his wife and their predecessors in title, owners of the tenement called Suntings, otherwise Fordland, otherwise Alfrey,
- C and the several occupiers of the same tenement, from time to time had actually taken and enjoyed as of right, in respect of the said tenement, without interruption, for the full periods of thirty years and sixty years respectively next preceding the commencement of this action, the right, profit, or benefit of cutting and carrying away brakes, fern, heather, and litter in and from the said 6,400 acres sufficient for the manurage, improvement, maintenance, sustaining, repairing, and amending the said tenement. BACON, V.-C., who in his judgment held that the decree of 1793 gave to the commoners the ordinary right of common of pasturage, or herbage, and that, the decree being unambiguous, evidence of acts committed subsequent to the decree was not admissible to explain its meaning, and also that the right claimed was a profit a prendre in alieno solo, and could not be claimed by prescription, granted an injunction against the defendants. The defendants appealed.

Elton, Q.C., Cope and Costelloe for the plaintiff.

JAMES, L.J.—We are of opinion that, upon the only point on which we have heard the plaintiff, which was whether Mr. Hale had made out the defence in F para. 15 of his defence, Mr. Hale has so made out his defence. Therefore, he will be entitled to the costs of the suit. The suit fails, because he has not done anything wrong, but has justified what he has done.

- The defendant, Hale, has proved de facto—he has given evidence which has not been cross-examined on—that for a period of upwards of sixty years, he has claimed to take and has taken, not by way of permission, not by way of concession on the
- G part of the lord, but as being his own right and as of right, that is to say, as a thing which he was entitled to do upon some right or other which he claimed, the litter from the forest to the farm for the use of that farm for the agricultural purposes to which litter would be put. Is that within the Prescription Act? It appears to me that, if we were to hold it was not, it would be repealing the Act. What the Act was intended to legalise and to allow was a thing done, as of right,
- H for a sufficient period, that is to say, for sixty years. It has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff that not only must it be shown to have been done as of right, but it must be shown to have been done under a claim of right, which claim would itself be capable of being supported as a valid prescription, or valid grant, or valid custom, and that if you could show that the thing was done under some claim which was not a claim to a valid legal right, it must fail.

- I In my opinion, that is not so in point of law, and is not so in point of fact, in this case. It does not signify, as it seems to me, what the exact language of the claim, if there were such, was, provided we know that the thing actually done was a thing which could have been legally granted to the man who was doing it, and which, therefore, could have had a legal origin. The thing which was actually done, according to the evidence, is exactly that which is legal, the exercise of a right to go on the forest to cut litter—not for the purpose of sale, not for any other purpose, but for the purpose of being used on the farm to which that litter was carried. That would be a good subject of prescription. If the thing has been done; if the same man has been doing it for sixty years for the purpose of sale, that may be good. I do not know what the limit would be, the case being confined to one particular matter growing upon the common, that is, the litter. The user here is confined to the taking of the litter to the farm-yard, there to be used as litter. Then it is said: "Yes, but you are doing this as one of a great body of persons."

There might have been something in the objection to be considered, if what was done was done by every inhabitant and everybody, and you could never distinguish between what one inhabitant or person was doing from what the other was doing; that there was nothing by which you could infer the acts of the one which did not apply to the others. I may give an example of that. It is not because the owner of a particular house in London shows that he and all the people who have lived in that house have gone every year to Hampstead Heath, and have run about the heath, that he could establish a particular right, as annexed to that house, to go upon Hampstead Heath, when it was quite clear that he was only going there like every other person who was coming from London who chose to go and recreate himself there. But here it is manifest from the evidence that there was a distinct right, a distinct right of a legal character, claimed by a particular class of persons who could in law have taken that right; that is to say, not qua class, not a corporation or quasi corporation, but persons constituting a class, that is, owners of particular tenements, every one of whom might have had a valid legal grant in exactly the same words to the same extent as this defendant would have had a legal grant. It is not a grant to a class, but they are a class because every one of them has got the same right.

Therefore, it is not a claim by custom, it is not a claim by a body of persons incapable of receiving such a grant, but a claim by each and every of a particular defined class of persons, each of those persons being recognised and being marked in respect of a particular tenement as appurtenant to which he was claiming the right. In that there was nothing illegal. There was nothing, in point of law, to prevent a grant of this kind, which might have been made if the lord had chosen to do it: "Whereas certain persons have already got the right of sole common of pasture upon the land, now I do grant to every one of those same persons that, in addition to that right of common, each and every of them shall have the right of cutting litter for the improvement of his farm." That would have been a perfectly valid grant, even if granted by one general deed to each person. Therefore, there is nothing in the fact that this defendant was doing that which every other person in the same circumstances as himself was doing, and nothing, therefore, to derogate from his own special right, that other persons in the same condition with himself were doing exactly the same thing. It cannot be brought up to this, that he and all of them were in fact constituting members of that class of trespassers which he and the other gentlemen, with the lord, were endeavouring to the best of their powers to put down because they were trespassers and because they had no rights. Therefore it appears to me that that objection as to the nature of the claim made by the defendant fails.

Then it is said, with respect to that same objection, that it is not proved that the defendant did not buy from a wrong-doer—that, instead of cutting the fern himself, he was not buying from some of the persons there during some of the years. To my mind, it is so improbable as to be absolutely incredible, that a man, believing he had the right which this defendant must have supposed he had (a right acknowledged by the lord, as it was believed, and to exist by everybody in the forest), must be regarded as a trespasser, and not as a man taking that which was his right; and that, instead of cutting the fern himself, or employing a man to cut it, he was paying the man for that which that man must have been stealing from him and the other commoners and the lord. I would as soon believe that he was paying a man who had stolen his mangel-wurzels or swedes instead of taking the mangel-wurzels and swedes himself from his field. I am satisfied upon that. Therefore, there was no foundation for the long criticism

A we had on the supposed nature of the user which Mr. Hale had; and, without going further into it, speaking as a judge of fact, I am satisfied that Mr. Hale has proved, not that he bought the fern from anyone, but that he did, by himself and his workmen, for the whole period of sixty years that was required by the statute, go upon this forest and cut the fern and take it to be enjoyed on his farm.

B There was another point, which, as we are only dealing with Mr. Hale, may not be so important, and which we did not call upon the plaintiff's counsel to deal with, that is to say, as to what was the construction of that decree of the Duchy Court, and what was the effect of that decree. It is impossible, as it seems to me, to give to that decree the meaning which has been attempted to be assigned to it by the defendant's counsel. When one sees what the object of the suit was, and the nature of the suit, the decree seems to me to be plain beyond
C all reasonable doubt. The lord, having a very large waste, and a waste that evidently was a great deal more than was wanted for the commonable cattle of the persons who had rights of common, commenced a suit in the Duchy Court of Lancaster, which had jurisdiction over this matter. It is said to have been an amicable suit, and apparently it was an amicable suit for the purpose of seeing how much of the waste he could take without injuring the commoners, and how much ought to be left to the commoners for the exercise of their rights of common.
D It was an approvement under the Statute of Merton through the medium of the court, to ascertain how much the lord could properly and justifiably approve under the statute as against the common of pasture. That appears to me to be the only thing that was determined, and the only thing that was intended to be determined,
E except some question about particular estovers which are comparatively of little amount, as to the right of estovers of birch, willow, and alder.

All that was done afterwards was this: It was said,

F "Whereas the commoners and the lord have now the right of enjoying the whole pasture by the mouths of their cattle in common, you, the commoners, shall now, on a particular part of that common, have the sole common pasturage and herbage. You shall have it there, and the lord shall take the rest for himself, and shall not have any more common of pasture or herbage upon that part which has been assigned to the commoners."

G It appears to me that the meaning of that was perfectly plain, that they were to have not any new common—no new right in the herbage or pasturage—but the enjoyment as under the old right of common of pasture and herbage in this spot exclusive of the lord, sole as against the lord, but in common as between themselves, and that the lord was to be excluded from having any further right of common with them in that which was the commonable right, the common, ordinary, well-known common of pasture or herbage which was known to the law at that time as it is now known.

H I am of opinion, therefore, upon that, that we cannot enlarge it. We can only say that they did take that common of pasture and common of herbage to themselves, exclusive of the lord, which they had before—that was common of pasture in the ordinary sense of the word—the taking of the grass by the mouths of their commonable cattle. Therefore, it appeared to me, and to the other members of the court, that the decree was perfectly clear upon this point, and that we could
I not attend to the great body of evidence that was used for the purpose, as it was said, of construing an ambiguous term (which I do not find in that decree) by the evidence of user. The user would not have explained it, and it was not admissible for the purpose of explaining it. Upon that part of the case the defendant fails in establishing, by user anterior to the decree, that any such right existed anterior to the decree when the matter was before the Duchy Court. I am of opinion, upon the whole, that the defendant has failed in everything but the right set up in para. 15 of his defence, and that he is entitled to the judgment of the court upon that paragraph, and, therefore, to have the action dismissed.

BRETT, L.J.—This action was brought claiming relief in respect of certain alleged acts which were said to be trespasses, and in respect of a manifest intention to continue those acts, unless the so-called trespassers were stopped. The action was brought by the owner of the land. Those acts of which complaint was made were necessarily, prima facie trespasses, and the defendants were called upon to defend those which were prima facie wrongful acts done by them or by their servants. The defendants, by their statement of defence, set up several distinct defences. Their first defence was founded upon an allegation that the acts now complained of had been in suit before between the predecessors of the plaintiff and the predecessors of the defendants, and that those acts had been determined by a decree, which was pleaded, to be lawful acts on the part of the predecessors of the defendants. Their first defence, therefore, raised a question as to what was the true construction of that decree. They next assumed to defend on the ground of a common law prescription, that is to say, an immemorial prescription on the part of the predecessors of the defendants and others, to do the acts complained of. They then, as I apprehend, set up another defence, which was that a grant by the predecessors of the plaintiff had been made to the predecessors of the defendants and others, to do these acts, which grant was lost. They then, as an absolutely distinct defence, set up the user, of that which is complained of by the predecessors of the defendants for sixty years under the Prescription Act.

With regard to the defence under the decree. The words of the decree were relied upon, and we had very learned and abstruse readings given to us from old books, and from dictionaries, in order to lead us to the conclusion that in the words "the sole common pasturage and herbage" was included the right to cut and carry away the brake, fern, heather, and litter, for the use of the farms of the persons such as the defendants. I declined, upon reading the whole of the proceedings in the suit in which that decree was made, to construe that decree by old books, or by dictionaries. It seems to me that the words, taking the whole of the decree and the pleadings in that suit, are not ambiguous, but are perfectly plain, quite irrespective of the use of each of the words. It seems to me apparent from the pleadings in that case that those who were defendants in it were claiming nothing but a well-known right, namely, the right of common of pasturage and herbage, that is to say, a right in respect of their tenements, and in respect of certain cattle, to feed upon this waste by the mouths of their cattle; not merely the grass, but whatever the cattle would eat, which I take to be included under the word "herbage" in that decree. It is clear from the pleadings that that was all they claimed as being part of the value of the whole waste to them, which was to be taken into consideration in proportioning that which was the real subject-matter of that suit, namely, how much the lord should be entitled to inclose, and how much should be left open for the commoners. If that was the state of the pleadings, then the meaning of the decree seems to me to be perfectly clear. It only dealt with that which was claimed. It empowered the lord to inclose a certain portion of the waste, and it left the other portion to be used by the commoners in the same way as they had claimed, but shut out the lord from that which would otherwise be a right of his, namely, to share in that mode of dealing with the waste. It shut him off from so dealing with the waste, on his part, in that part of the waste or forest which was not inclosed.

Therefore, the real meaning of the decree was, that, as to these 6,400 acres which were left open, the commoners were to have the right of taking estovers, which is what they had claimed, in certain woods, and in certain woods only, and were to have the right, with regard to the cattle on their farms, to common of pasture and herbage in the sense I have stated, that is, feeding by the mouths of their cattle, and the lord was to give up his right to put his own cattle on that part of the forest and any right of taking that wood which they would have to take as estovers; but it left the lord in the possession, with regard to that uninclosed part, of every other right which he had possessed before. It did not, therefore, give the commoners, who were then setting up their rights, the right

A which they now claim, namely, to cut brake, fern, heather, and litter growing upon that open waste for the use of their farms. That is what they had not claimed, and that was not given to them. Indeed, that subject-matter did not enter into the contemplation of any of the parties to that suit at all. Therefore, upon the interpretation of the decree, I think that the contention of the defendants here has been wrong from the beginning, and that the plaintiff was right in his contention. It was attempted to make us come to a contrary conclusion by a mass of evidence of alleged user since the time of that decree until now, for the purpose of construing that decree. It is obvious that you may always give evidence of the state of things existing at the time that a decree is made or a deed is executed. It is very rarely indeed that you are allowed, for the purpose of construing a document, to bring in evidence of what has been done since; but, at all events, it seems to me to be clear that that evidence was not admissible for that purpose, because upon the true construction of the decree, taking it in company with the pleadings in the suit which ended in that decree, there was no ambiguity in the words or phrases at all, and such evidence was, to my mind, inadmissible, and certainly cannot control the construction of the document.

D It was alleged by way of defence, that we ought to find a common law prescription or an immemorial prescription; and it was said that from the modern user we have a right to infer such a prescription. It seems to me that no such claim was made in the suit in the Duchy Court at that time, and that no such practice existed; because, if there had been any such claim, it would have been most material for the defendants to put it forth in order to see how much of the forest should be left to them. It seems to me to be clear that no such practice existed before that decree, as is now alleged, and that no such right was claimed, and, therefore, any claim from a more modern usage to an immemorial prescription is put an end to. It is shown by that fact alone that the user must have commenced as a claim of right after that decree, and, therefore, within a known and given time.

E The other allegation was that we ought to presume a lost grant. The doctrine with regard to presumption of lost grants, and what it is necessary to prove, and what ought to be in the mind of the court, is at the present moment a very much controverted matter. For my part I have always been of opinion, and, until corrected, I must hold to that opinion, that, if you are asked to find the fact of a grant and say that it has been lost, you must have some belief that it was so. I decline to find it. It seems to me that there is no evidence upon which one ought to find that there had been a grant, since the time of that decree, by the owner of this property, and that such a grant has been lost.

G Therefore, the case comes to be whether the defendant has made out his defence under the Prescription Act; that is the only defence which is left for him to maintain. The first point with regard to that raises the question: What is the true construction of the Prescription Act? It seems to me that, in order to maintain a defence under the Prescription Act, those who set it up must first show, if they set up a prescription for sixty years, that they have exercised—that is, that they have taken or enjoyed as a fact for sixty years—a certain right, or profit, or benefit. Right, in that sense, means a right to do something; that is, a right which can be taken or enjoyed. In the present case, therefore, what the defendant has to show is that he and his predecessors have, for sixty years, taken or enjoyed the right of cutting, by themselves or their servants, the brake, fern, heather, and litter upon these uninclosed acres for the use of this particular farm. The next fact, according to the true construction of the Act, which anyone who relies upon it has to prove is that that right, profit, or benefit, which he has so taken or enjoyed for sixty years, he has exercised as of right. The true interpretation of those words "as of right" seems to me to be that he has done so upon a claim to do it, as having a right to do it without the lord's repeated permission, and that he has so done it without that permission. That is the whole meaning of doing it "as of right." If he shows that he has claimed to do it, not as a thing permitted to him year by year by the lord, but as a thing that he had a right to do, whether the lord said: "You may do it" or not, that is all that is necessary for him to A prove.

Having proved those two things, the remainder of that which is necessary in order to make the statute applicable is a pure question of law, and not of fact.
It is a pure question of law whether those acts which have been so done could have been the subject-matter of a custom, or prescription, or grant, and not B whether they were claimed as a matter of prescription, or custom, or grant. So that, in any tribunal where the adjudication of the facts is separated from the adjudication of the law, as in the case of a trial by judge and jury, it would be for the jury to say what were the acts done, whether they had been done for sixty years, and whether for sixty years they had been claimed to be done without regard to the permission of the lord; and if they found that certain acts were done, then, as a pure question of law, the judge would have to decide whether such acts C so done could have been the subject-matter of a custom, prescription, or grant.

Then comes the question what are the facts which the defendant has proved?
I am bound to say that it seems to me that, where the statute is set up, by the defendant to a suit, what is done by other people or in other cases is no evidence with regard to the issue raised between the plaintiff and the defendant; the only D evidence which is admissible is the evidence of what has been done by the defendant or his predecessor, and whether he had done so on the claim of doing it without the consent of the lord, or contrary to his consent. Here it seems to me that the evidence must be treated, not according to a minute criticism of the words which may be elicited from a witness during cross-examination, but as any tribunal which has to adjudicate upon evidence ought to do, trying to find out and understand, and then acting upon that which the witness really means to say. E [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence.] It seems to me that the defendant did prove that for sixty years previous to the commencement of this suit his predecessors and himself in this farm had exercised the right by themselves and their servants to cut the brakes, fern, heather, and litter, to be used upon the farm, during certain months of the year. It seems to me that that was all that he proved. He did not prove a right to mow the grass upon this waste, where there F was no heather, if that is now asserted or pretended. It seems to me he did not show that they had exercised the right of cutting down anything which could be fairly and reasonably called fir trees, even of young growth. If, in cutting the heather, he cut that which some people may call young fir trees, that is, the shoots of a year's growth, or things which are really not noticeable, which nobody could distinguish from the heather, or if he cut grass which was growing among the G heather, it would be idle to suppose he is prevented from cutting the heather because he may cut a blade of grass or this very young growth. But, if it is asserted that, in cutting the heather, he has a right to cut anything like a real growth of fir trees, I say that that has not been proved, and that he would exceed his right if he did so.

Then it was said that, even if this right had been exercised at the commence- H ment of the sixty years, it was not shown that it had been exercised during the whole of them. I think it is necessary to come to the conclusion that he had exercised the right year by year, and that, if he failed to give satisfactory evidence that he had done these things during some part of the intermediate period, he would not prove that which lies upon him under the statute. If, therefore, it had been shown that, instead of cutting this litter, as I will call it now, by his I own servants, he had submitted to that which was alleged, namely, to the fact of tramps or gipsies, or people who were undoubtedly trespassers, cutting the fern, appropriating it to themselves as litter belonging to them, which they sold, although they would have no right to sell it—if he or his predecessors had submitted to that, and, instead of cutting his litter by his own servants, had bought it from those people, as buying from them that which they had a right to sell, if it could have been shown that he had done that for a year or two years, without cutting any litter during that year or two years by his own servants at all—I should

A have thought that a gap had been made in the user for sixty years, and that he could not have succeeded under this plea. If he had bought from such people in each year, but also during each year had cut a part by himself and his servants under the claim of right, the mere fact of wrongful buying from these people would not, in my opinion, have destroyed the continuity of his actual user. As my Lord observed during the case, however, no person was called on behalf of the plaintiff to show that anybody ever had sold such things to the defendants. The oral evidence is conclusive that what the defendant did had been done from year to year.

Then it was said that, although the defendant has taken this litter by himself and his servants (only such litter as he used on his farm), yet he fails because he claimed to do it in respect of a claim which could not be supported in law by way of prescription, or custom, or grant. It was said that, although he had taken this litter by his servants and for the use of his farm, yet he asserted he did so because all the inhabitants of the district had a right to do so. I do not think he did make the claim in that form; but it seems clear to me, upon the construction which I put upon the statute, that, if he had, it would have made no difference—that the claiming to exercise the right—which he did in fact exercise in respect of some claim, or, if you please, a right in that sense, which could not be supported—is wholly immaterial, because, as I have said, the only question is, when he has once proved the facts, whether the court is of opinion that such facts could be supported by a prescription or a custom or a grant, if such had been proved. That objection, therefore, fails. If it had been shown that the defendant and his predecessors had not only taken the litter which was to be used on their farms, but had taken litter for the purpose of selling it—if their actual user, therefore, had not been merely the taking the fern for the use of the farm, but the taking of the fern generally although part of it was used on the farm—then I think we should have had to consider the ruling of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Chilton v. London Corpn. (1). I should be inclined to think that, if that had been the user proved, that would have destroyed the claim to take it in respect of the farm. But if all that was taken was taken for the use of the farm, then the assuming to take that under an erroneous view, or in respect of an erroneous claim, seems to me immaterial.

It was then said that litter was taken because the defendant and his predecessors had been of opinion that they had a right to do so under the words of the decree, and that that view was erroneous. For the same reason it seems to me to be immaterial, because that is not one of the points which can prevent the right.

Therefore, I think that the user has been established, and I think it is clear that the defendant and his predecessors, from whatever view they did so, assumed to do it at all events upon a right to do it, whether the lord permitted them or not. Then comes the question: Could such a right be the subject-matter of a grant? In my opinion, it clearly could, as a matter of law. Therefore, the defence on that part was made out. There was one other point, which was as to the frame of mind with which one should come to the contemplation of a claim made under the Prescription Act; and there seems to be considerable authority—dicta at all events by learned judges sitting in the Court of Chancery—that, where the facts of user are proved, the court ought to be astute to discover some legal mode in which the claim might be maintained. That is to say, that the court ought to lean, and lean heavily always, in favour of this defence of a prescription under the statute. If by that is meant that the court ought to look at the evidence with anything like an extremely indulgent view, I beg leave to say that I cannot accede to that view. It seems to me that there is nothing so dangerous as to lay down, as if it were matter of law, a machine rule for dealing with evidence of matters of fact, where the Prescription Act is vouched in order to maintain that which one believes to have been a true right, although the evidence of it may be wanting. I should be inclined, and I should certainly advise a jury, always to look at the evidence with considerable indulgence. But if one was of opinion that the statute was vouched in order to create a right which one believes did not really exist, I should myself act upon this view, and I should advise a jury to act upon the same—to look, under those circumstances, at the evidence with considerable strictness. In the present case, looking at it in what way you will, it seems to me that the evidence fairly considered is conclusive as to the user, that user may be the subject of a valid right, such as is described in the statute, and the defendants' defence in para. 15 of the defence is, therefore, made out. It seems to me that every other part of the statement of defence has failed; that, therefore, this appeal must be allowed; and that the decree of the Vice-Chancellor ought to have been founded on the view that the defendants had made out the defence under para. 15 and under that paragraph alone.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an action of trespass, and the alleged acts of trespass complained of are cutting heather and fern for the purpose of carrying it away to be used as litter on a farm called Suntings. The question is whether the defendant, by any of the defences he has raised, has justified that, so that the plaintiff cannot succeed in his action of trespass. In my opinion, the only defence upon which the defendant has succeeded is that raised by para. 15 of his statement of defence, in which he alleges that these acts of alleged trespass have been done by him and his predecessors in title in respect of that farm of Suntings for upwards of sixty years.

The first question to be decided is whether that is such a defence as in this case was capable of being raised. The Vice-Chancellor's view was that it was not capable of being raised. To a great extent, the matter was decided when the Master of the Rolls—and there was no appeal from his order—declined to strike out para. 15 as an alternative defence. I think he was right in not striking it out, because, although there are other defences raised, which, if the evidence had gone to support them, might have made this a defence which could not have been raised, yet, in my opinion, the defendant was justified in putting this on the record as an alternative defence. Of course, it would be a question whether, having regard to the statute, by the evidence which he has adduced he has made out his defence, and for that purpose I will refer very shortly to the statute.

It was said that in order to bring a case within the statute it must be shown that the same right which the statute will support has been vouched in support of the acts which have been done, that is to say, that the acts which have been done must have been done under a title, the same as is supported by the statute; and it is said here that these acts, if they are made out in fact to have been done for sixty years, were done, not under what the court thinks would give a good defence, but as under a custom which the court holds incapable of proof and not proved. I quite agree with what BRETT, L.J., has said, and I shall be very short, therefore, in my observations upon the statute.

What the statute requires is that you must see whether the acts which the defendant claims a right to do in the suit are such as could be supported as lawful by custom, prescription, or grant; and then you must see whether the acts have been done as of right, that is to say, not secretly, not as acts of violence, not under permission from time to time given by the person on whose soil the acts were done. I say "from time to time given," not that it should necessarily be yearly, but from time to time during the period the exercise during which is said to establish the right; because, if there has been permission before the sixty years, that is not sufficient to prevent the defendant from establishing his claim unless it has been by consent or by agreement in writing. That is expressly provided by s. 1 of the statute. But, in my opinion, if there is permission from time to time given and accepted during the period relied upon, that does prevent what is essential, that the acts should be done as of right; and I may also say, because it bears upon the present case, that it must be shown that the acts were done in respect of some tenement owned by the defendant and his predecessors in title. What one has

A first to consider is whether the acts of the defendant have, in fact, been done by him and his predecessors in title for the period of sixty years.

Upon that point, I must say that, until I heard the evidence read again I entertained some doubt, and I did so for this reason. We must have evidence of the beginning of the period, and we must have evidence to satisfy us that, successively from year to year, where the right claimed is so capable of being exercised, and
B probably, if it were a right, would be exercised, from year to year, the acts have been done not only in the first year, but in successive years down to the commencement of the suit. The only evidence which could be relied on, as regards the doing of these acts at the beginning of the sixty years, was the evidence of Robert Edwards. I agree with BRETT, L.J., that we ought to come to the conclusion on his evidence that he has established that, in respect of this farm of Suntings, the
C cutting and carrying away of litter has been done by the predecessors in title of the defendant at the beginning of the period of sixty years—that is that the right now claimed has been exercised for at least sixty years. But it was said that it had not been done by the defendant or his predecessors in title. Of course, that would be material, because if persons had, without any directions from him, cut the fern and litter, and then, treating it as their own, had come and sold it to
D him, that would not have been an exercise by him in respect of this farm of the right of cutting and carrying away the litter. But, in my opinion, it is immaterial whether the act done on his behalf was done by his regular servants, that is to say, by persons permanently employed by him, or by persons whom he made, for the time being, his servants, by directing them to go and cut; and the question must be whether that is what he did, for certainly he did not always cut the fern
E by his own servants, or whether he bought it from persons who, not as his agents, had cut it. On the evidence I think we must come to the conclusion, not only that this act was done by the predecessor in title of the defendant at the beginning of the sixty years, but that there was continuous exercise of that right to cut by him from time to time down to the commencement of the suit.

There is another matter, which is perhaps of a more serious nature. It is said
F that a number of persons were cutting this fern, not in respect of their own particular farms, but under a general supposition that the decree gave them a right to do so, or that there was some custom which justified it. In my opinion, it is not necessary under the statute that the acts done should at the time have been attempted to have been justified in a way in which we think they can legally be justified, if the person doing them was claiming to do them as of right.
G What particular right they have alleged, unless there was permission from time to time given by the lord, in my opinion is not material under the statute. But no doubt it must be shown that the acts of the defendant are acts of user in connection with his particular tenement; and here, I think, we have that, because what has been proved in respect of this defendant and his predecessors in title is that they cut the heather and fern (I will call it litter for shortness) in respect
H of and for the use of that farm only, and, that being so, he did exercise this as a right in respect of that tenement, and connects it with the tenement and the possession and occupation of the tenement and ownership of the tenement. That, in my opinion, distinguishes this case from Blewett v. Tregonning (2) and Hammerton v. Honey (3). We must not look at the evidence and the finding of the jury upon the evidence to guide us here; but we must look at the law laid down by the judges
I who decided Blewett v. Tregonning (2) upon an application for a new trial. All that was laid down is contained in the judgment of PATTESON, J., the judgment of WILLIAMS, J., being to the same, or nearly to the same, effect. PATTESON, J., says:

"It must be pointed out to the jury that they must be satisfied that the occupiers of the farm enjoyed the privilege, because they were occupiers, and that the right was attached to the farm."

However much other persons who have no right claim to cut litter, and although there was a general supposition that this right was given by the decree, or possibly that nobody would or could be interfered with who cut it, or that there was a custom in the district, yet when we do find that Mr. Hale and his predecessors in title cut it for the purpose of carrying it off to Suntings, and there used it, and only cut what they required for the purposes of that farm, in my opinion, that does connect the acts done with the farm, and enables them to be given in evidence in support of the claim to prescription under the Prescription Act. A

Hammerton v. Honey (3) at first sight seemed more in favour of the plaintiff, but in that case what was attempted to be asserted was a claim of all the inhabitants of a village to use a green for the purpose of recreation. The evidence given was that all people, whether of the village or elsewhere, had used it; and, therefore, that would not support a claim of right in respect of the inhabitants of that village. Some of the persons who used it happened to be inhabitants of the village, but there was no distinction at all as between their user and that of all the rest of her Majesty's subjects, and, therefore, the user by all her Majesty's subjects as such, the villagers not using it as villagers, but as her Majesty's subjects, did not afford any evidence in support of the claim that was there sought to be established. There was no distinction between those who were not inhabitants of the village in their user and those who were. That case, in my opinion, does not support the contention of the plaintiff. B C D

The defence under para. 15 of the defence, in my opinion, the defendant has succeeded in proving; but, although that disposes of the case, I think one ought not to leave altogether untouched that which occupied a great deal of the argument for the defendants, and a great deal of the evidence and pleading—the claim under the decree of 1693. I quite agree with the view of the Vice-Chancellor and of the other lords justices on that point. The decree of 1693 does not in terms give the defendant the right which he claims here, and those who are in a similar position as commoners claim. In my opinion, looking at the decree, it is decidedly against such a construction—so decidedly as not to leave the words of the decree in any way ambiguous. The decree is founded upon the report of the commission. I will not go into the circumstances under which and the object for which that was issued. What was recommended was that the commoners should have these 6,400 acres for common of pasture and herbage, and that the lord should not be allowed to turn out any cattle there. What the lord is excluded from shows what the commoners were to have. Then we come to the words in the latter part of the decree, which were relied upon and alone give foundation for the argument, that “sole common pasturage and herbage” was something different from common of pasture. We must construe those words fairly by looking at the whole of the decree; and when we find how the commissioners' report, as regards the lord, the owner of the soil, is construed and the language used, we find that “common of pasture” is used for just the same purpose as common pasturage. In the one case common is used (possibly improperly) as a substantive, and in the other (possibly properly) as an adjective, for the lord is excluded by the decree from claiming any common of pasture or herbage upon the land. In my opinion, all that is given by the decree over these 6,400 acres to the commoners is common of pasture in the ordinary sense of those words, and we cannot, in my opinion, properly construe those words of the decree by any reference to usage subsequently to the date of the decree. E F G H

There is only one other matter, namely, the user alleged to be proved before the date of that decree. Without going through the documents, I may express my opinion that the Vice-Chancellor was quite right in the conclusion at which he arrived upon the careful examination which he had of all the documents, and that there was not any evidence to satisfy the court, from which the court ought to have drawn the conclusion that the commoners, as they are called, the owners of these tenements, had previously to that decree the right of cutting the litter and fern as in manner claimed by the defence. I must say one word as regards another matter. The defendant has claimed a right entirely to exclude the lord from any interest, not only in the litter and herbage, but also in young seedlings. It I

A does not appear that what has been done by the defendant has included the cutting of seedlings; but, in my opinion, all that he is justified in doing is cutting the litter, but that he will not be answerable for anything which he unavoidably does in cutting the litter. He has no right to destroy trees as trees, or to destroy seedlings, if in cutting the litter, which, in my opinion, he has a right to do, he can avoid cutting and destroying those seedlings and trees.

Power of Appointment—Appointment by will—Exercise of power under covenants in mortgage deed—Appointment to mortgagee—Covenant not to revoke will—Bankruptcy of covenantor—Effect on covenant—Subsequent will made revoking former will and appointing to another appointee—Validity of second appointment.

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of marriage.

L.M.B., a spinster, having an absolute power of appointment by will over the capital of a trust fund, made a will and appointed it to the mortgagee pursuant to a covenant in the mortgage deed which also contained a covenant not to revoke the will. Subsequently she was adjudicated a bankrupt, and, after obtaining her discharge, she made another will revoking her former will and appointing the capital to her executors.

Held: (i) the covenant not to revoke the will was divisible, and, although the marriage of the covenantor would revoke the will, it was not void as necessarily being a covenant in restraint of marriage; (ii) the covenant was not discharged by the bankruptcy as it was ancillary to the mortgage and not to the debt, and, the breach having been committed after the bankruptcy, an action for damages for breach of covenant was maintainable.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of KAY, J., overruling the defendant's demurrer in an action by the plaintiffs, the executors of the mortgagee, against the defendant, an executor of the mortgagor, to recover £710 8s. 9d. (the amount due for principal and interest) as damages for breach of covenant, in the mortgage deed, not to revoke the will dated Feb. 7, 1859. A

Under the will of John Bohn £1,202 15s. 7d. Bank Annuities stood limited in trust for Lydia Marina Bohn during her life, and after her decease upon trust for such person or persons as she should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment for her next-of-kin. By a mortgage deed dated Feb. 5, 1859, L. M. Bohn, being a spinster, assigned the dividends on the £1,202 15s. 7d. Bank Annuities during her life, together with a policy of assurance on her life, to Henry Robinson, to secure the repayment of money advanced by him, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum. The deed contained a covenant by L. M. Bohn that she would forthwith duly make her last will pursuant to and in exercise of the power given to her by the will of John Bohn; and would, by her will, appoint unto H. Robinson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the principal sum of £1,202 15s. 7d. upon trust, after payment of the premiums and expenses therein mentioned, to retain for himself or themselves the principal money and interest for the time being due under the mortgage, and all interest on account, and to pay the residue or surplus thereof to such person or persons as L. M. Bohn should, by her will, appoint; and that she should not do or commit any act, deed, matter, or thing whatsoever whereby, or by reason or means whereof, the will to be made and executed by her should or might be revoked, annulled, cancelled, obliterated, impeached, or affected in any manner whatsoever; and that she would, within one week, deliver to and deposit with H. Robinson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the will, and would permit it to remain in the custody of H. Robinson, his executors, administrators or assigns, so long as any money should remain owing to him or them on the money advanced. L. M. Bohn duly made a will dated Feb. 7, 1859, and delivered it to H. Robinson, in accordance with the covenants of the deed. On April 10, 1862, L. M. Bohn, being still a spinster, and not being a trader, was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on June 4, 1862, she obtained her discharge. H. Robinson died in 1870, leaving the plaintiff in the present action and others (since deceased) his executors. On Aug. 28, 1876, L. M. Bohn made another will, and after appointing the defendant, F. Ommanney, and others to be her executors, gave them all her estate and effects and in exercise of the power given her by the will of John Bohn, appointed and bequeathed the £1,202 15s. 7d. to her executors upon certain trusts, and revoked all previous wills made by her. On April 3, 1880, L. M. Bohn died, and her last will was proved by the defendant Ommanney alone. B

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—There is nothing in this appeal. With regard to the first point the covenant is, as was pointed out by KAY, J., divisible. So far as it was in restraint of marriage it was bad; you could not bring an action for breach of covenant by the marriage of the covenantor, but that does not destroy the covenant. As to the second point, this is a covenant in a mortgage. L. M. Bohn mortgages her life interest in the dividends, and then appoints the capital to the mortgagee by her will. That is a very good mortgage if the will is not revoked, and then she covenants not to revoke the will. It would have been just as good a covenant if there had been no debt from the covenantor; as, for instance, if there had been a suretyship. The covenant was ancillary not to the debt, but to the mortgage. It is clear that, there being no breach of covenant before her bankruptcy, the covenantee could not have proved in the bankruptcy. He could not prove for the possibility of a breach. Then why should not the executor of the bankrupt be now liable? I see no reason why the bankruptcy should destroy her liability under the covenant. I think that KAY, J., was quite right, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. H

A COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The covenant was in a mortgage deed, there had been no breach of it before the bankruptcy, and it could not be estimated so as to make it provable in the bankruptcy. That being so, and there being a breach after the bankruptcy, why should not this action be brought? It is said that the covenant was ancillary to the debt, and that the debt being discharged the covenant is gone too. But it was not ancillary to the debt in any sense except B in the sense that it is a covenant not to destroy the mortgage, and is ancillary to the mortgage by which the debt is secured. In my opinion the breach having been committed after the bankruptcy, this action is maintainable, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

[Reported 25 Ch.D. 89; 53 L.J.Ch. 185; 49 L.T. 690; 32 W.R. 102]

Annuity—Partnership—Annuity payable to executors of deceased partner for benefit of widow—Trust money—Freedom from claims of creditors of estate.

F By articles of partnership between two solicitors the executors of a deceased partner were entitled to receive an annuity out of the net profits of the partnership to be applied in such manner as the deceased partner should by deed or will direct for the benefit of his widow and children and in default of such direction for the benefit of the widow. A partner died. By his will he appointed his widow sole executrix and gave her all his real and personal estate subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, but G he did not either by deed or will direct how the annuity payable under the partnership articles should be applied. The estate proved insolvent, an administration action was brought by a creditor, and a receiver was appointed.

The question arose whether the annuity payable formed part of the deceased partner's assets or whether the widow was beneficially entitled to it.

H Held: the annuity did not form part of the deceased partner's assets, but under the articles was trust money for the benefit of the widow, and so it was free from the claims of creditors of the estate.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of NORTH, J., holding, on a summons by the defendant, that the receiver should pay an annuity, under cl. 35 in partnership articles, to the defendant for her own use and benefit for so long as it should remain payable or until further order. A

T. W. Flavell was a solicitor, and carried on business in partnership with J. F. Bowman, under the provisions of articles of partnership dated July 6, 1875. The partnership was to be for the term of ten years from May 1, 1875, if both partners should so long live. Clause 3 provided for the determination of the partnership by notice. Clause 35 provided that from the determination of the partnership the retiring partner, his executors or administrators, or the executors or administrators of the deceased partner, should be entitled to receive out of the net profits of the partnership business during so much (if any) of the term of five years from May 1, 1880, as should remain after the determination of the partnership, if the retiring or deceased partner should be Flavell, the yearly sum of £350, and during so much (if any) of the term of five years from May 1, 1885, as either the retiring partner or a widow of the retiring or deceased partner should be living, if such partner should be Flavell, the yearly sum of £250, B C

"any yearly sum which may under this present article for the time being become payable to the executors or administrators of a deceased partner to be applied in such manner as such partner shall by deed or will direct for the benefit of his widow and children or child (if any) or any of them, and in default of such direction to be paid to such widow, if living, for her own benefit, or if not living, then to the guardian or guardians for the time being of such children or child for the benefit of such children or child." D

"yearly sum payable under the last preceding article shall, so far as legally may be, be constituted a charge upon the net profits of the partnership business."

By his will, dated Sept. 26, 1845, T. W. Flavell devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for ever, subject to the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. He did not by deed or will direct how the money payable to his executors or administrators under the provisions of the partnership articles was to be applied, unless the will was to be construed as giving such a direction. He died without issue on Jan. 7, 1883, and the defendant A. Flavell was his widow and sole executrix. F

An administration action was brought by the plaintiff, a creditor, against A. Flavell, the testator's widow, and on May 24, 1883, judgment was pronounced and a receiver appointed of the rents and profits of the testator's real and leasehold estate and to get in his outstanding personal estate. The question arose whether the annuity payable under the provisions of the partnership articles to the executrix formed part of the testator's assets, or whether the widow was beneficially entitled to it, and the present summons was taken out by the defendant. G H

NORTH, J., decided in her favour, and the plaintiff appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and J. R. Brooke for the plaintiff.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and E. W. Byrne for the defendant.

COTTON, L.J.—This appeal seeks to have an order made that the annuity covenanted to be paid by the testator's partner shall be paid to the receiver appointed to collect the assets of the testator, instead of to his widow, as directed by the order of NORTH, J. Of course that order, if made, would assume that the annuity, when it came to the hands of his executrix, was part of the testator's estate, and not part of his trust property, because, if it was part of his trust property, it would not go to his creditors. The annuity arises under cl. 35 of the articles of partnership, which provides for two events, one of which is the retirement of a partner from the partnership during his life, and the other the determination of the partnership by his death. These events are provided for in I

A different ways, though in one clause of the articles. The event which has happened is the death of a partner; and in that event, by the article I have mentioned, an annuity for some years is to be paid to the executors of the deceased partner. The executors were to apply the annuity in such a manner as the deceased partner directed for the benefit of his widow and children, and in default to his widow for her own benefit. The testator's death is the only event we have to consider, and the question is simply whether the money which is now payable is to be treated as part of the testator's assets, or as trust funds.

B A good deal of the argument was based on this being part of the testator's property, and if it was, the executrix takes it subject to his liabilities. We have to inquire then what are the grounds for saying that it was his property. It was said first of all that this was part of the testator's property because he could have released his partner, at any time before his death, from the covenant to pay it. But he did not release it, and the covenant remains to pay money to the testator's executors to be held upon certain trusts. But then it is said that, because the covenant could be released, there was only a contract to make a trust, and that the court would not enforce such a contract in favour of a mere volunteer. But I asked counsel for the plaintiff whether the testator could have altered the trusts applying to the money after it came to the hands of his executors so as to deprive his widow of the benefit of it, and he could not, to my mind, deal satisfactorily with my question. He said the testator could do so, and that was all. The money was already impressed with a trust when it reached the hands of the executrix. It was money which, under a contract for value, in its inception and creation existed only as being held on these trusts for the benefit of the testator's widow. It is said that the widow is only a volunteer, but that does not prevent her from insisting on the trusts being performed. The question is not between the widow and the surviving partner, but between her and the executrix of the testator. What is the position of the testator's legal personal representative as to this fund, which ex hypothesi is paid over to her? It never came to her as part of the testator's estate, but as a fund impressed with a trust in favour of his widow. I by no means favour the idea that, if this had been a declaration of trust of the testator's own property, the deed could have been impeached; but I put my decision on the ground that the annuity came to the executrix not as assets, but as trust property.

E LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What kind of a document are we dealing with? It is not a voluntary or fraudulent deed, but a bargain between two partners that if one dies the survivor is to carry on the business, and pay an annuity to be applied for the benefit of the widow. What is the matter with it? It is not fraudulent; it is not a legacy; it is not revocable. It is said to be a voluntary settlement; but if it is, that does not matter if it cannot be impeached. I do not, however, think that it was a voluntary settlement; it was a contract for value. Then it is said that the annuity formed part of the testator's assets, and cannot be diverted from his creditors. The answer is, that it is no part of his assets at all. Unless this contract can be impeached on the ground of fraud, I cannot see why it should not be supported.

[Reported 44 L.T. 694; 45 J.P. 600]

Agent—Principal—Liability for act of agent—Misrepresentation by agent—Sale of goods with defect—Defect known to principal, but fraudulently concealed from agent.

The principal's son, acting for and with the authority of his father, represented that certain sheep which he sold to a buyer were sound. The father had fraudulently concealed from his son that the sheep had the rot and gave his son authority to sell them for the best price, intending that his son should represent that they were sound.

Held: where a principal employed an agent ignorant of the truth in order that the agent might innocently make a false statement believing it to be true and might so deceive the party with whom he was dealing the representation by the agent became the misrepresentation by the principal so as to vitiate the contract, and the principal was liable in an action for damages for misrepresentation.

A Appeal by the defendant in an action for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation from a decision of the Common Pleas Division (GROVE and LINDLEY, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a new trial.

The plaintiff claimed damages for fraudulent misrepresentation made to the plaintiff by the defendant's son, acting for and on behalf of the defendant, to the effect that certain sheep, which the plaintiff purchased from the defendant's son, B were sound, whereas they had the rot. The action was first tried in July, 1879, at Maidstone, before BAGGALLAY, L.J., and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. A new trial was subsequently granted by the Court of Appeal, on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence of authority from the father to the son to make the representation complained of. The second trial took place before DENMAN, J., when the jury found that the son had authority from his father to make the representation; that the defendant fraudulently withheld from his son the knowledge C that the sheep had the rot, but negatived fraud in the son. Upon these findings a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, and judgment given accordingly. The defendant obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, which was discharged by the Common Pleas Division and the defendant now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 15, 1881. BRETT, L.J., read the following judgment in which BAGGALLAY, L.J., concurred. This was an action brought to recover damages alleged to be the result of a fraudulent misrepresentation made on the sale of sheep. The statement of claim averred, among other allegations, that upon the sale to the plaintiff the defendant's son, acting for the defendant, and with the defendant's authority, represented that the sheep were all right; that the sheep were not all right, but were diseased and affected with rot; that the statement was fraudulent on the part of the defendant, and that the defendant had purposely concealed and withheld from his son the fact that the sheep had the rot, with intent that the son might sell them in ignorance of the fact, and make, if necessary, such statement as he did make respecting the condition of the sheep, etc. The allegation of fraud by the defendant was denied in the statement of defence.

F At the trial, before DENMAN, J., and a jury, several questions were left to and answered by the jury, which were as follows:

G (i) "Did the defendant's son in fact represent that the sheep were all right?" Answer: "Yes." (ii) "If so, had he the defendant's authority for so representing?" Answer: "Yes." (iii) "Did the son fraudulently represent that the sheep were all right, knowing that they had the rot?" Answer: "We believe he knew it, but we can't say there is sufficient evidence for us to say that it was fraudulently done." (iv) "Did the defendant fraudulently authorise his son to represent that the sheep were all right, knowing them to have the rot?" H Answer: "Yes." (v) "Did the defendant fraudulently conceal from his son that the sheep had the rot, and fraudulently give the son authority to sell them for the best price, intending that the son should represent that they were sound, so as to obtain the best price for them?" Answer: "Yes." (vi) "Was the plaintiff materially influenced towards buying the sheep by a representation I that the sheep were all right, or was he wholly induced by other causes?" Answer: "Yes; we think he was also influenced by the statement that they came from Lenny's farm. We don't believe they were Lenny's sheep, and regret he was not called."

Upon these findings, and upon the pleadings and evidence, many questions were disputed in the Divisional Court and before us.

It was urged on behalf of the defendant that there was no evidence of authority from him to his son to make any representation as to the sheep; that he was not bound by any misrepresentation of his son; that there was no evidence of fraud in the defendant; that there was no evidence in support of the fifth question; that the answer to the sixth question was contrary to the weight of the evidence. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the son was a general agent of the father to sell for him, and that, therefore, the son's representation bound the father; that the father was a commission salesman, and that his son was his agent, and, therefore, the son's representations bound the father; that if the son was only agent on this particular occasion, yet, from the simple fact of his being sent to sell, he had an implied authority to make a representation at least as to the quality and condition of the thing to be sold, if not as to other matters; that such authority was, at all events, to be implied from the direction to sell for the best price; that there was evidence to justify the leaving of the fifth question to the jury, and that it was a proper question to be left; that there was evidence to justify the answer to the sixth question. We were on the hearing clearly of opinion that there was ample evidence to justify a finding of fraudulent intention in the defendant; and that the admitted truthfulness of the plaintiff justified the jury in finding, as we think they did, that the plaintiff was induced to purchase by the representation that the sheep were all right.

We took time to consider the questions which were discussed whether there was such authority from the defendant to his son as was sufficient to bind him by reason of his son's representations to a liability to pay damages in an action for deceit. These questions were to be determined, as it seemed to us, upon the finding of fraud in the father without a finding of fraud in the son. If the son was authorised to make the representations, whether such authority was express or implied, we are of opinion that the defendant was, by reason of his own fraudulent mind, liable, notwithstanding want of fraud in the son. We are of this opinion, notwithstanding the decision in Cornfoot v. Fowke (1), if that decision is contrary to this view. Several of the propositions, however, enunciated as to the authority to be implied, seemed to us to raise questions of considerable difficulty; but, upon consideration, we are of opinion that it is not necessary to determine them.

We think that the following facts afforded sufficient evidence to justify the leaving to the jury of the fifth question, and their answer to it. The sheep were affected with rot; the symptoms of that disease are such as would not improbably induce questions from an intending buyer as to the condition of the sheep; the defendant knew that the sheep had the disease; it was eminently probable that he would at least suspect that the inquiry as to the condition of the sheep would be made: his answer on cross-examination to the question, "Why he did not tell his son?" that he "was not such a fool" was an impudent admission; he directed his son to sell for the best price without telling his son the fact, known to himself, that the sheep were affected with rot. These facts seem to us sufficient to justify the jury in drawing the inferences which induced their answer to the fifth question. If that question, therefore, was one which might properly be left to the jury, in order to justify a finding of authority from the defendant to his son to bind him, the defendant, by the misrepresentation in fact made by the son, the findings on the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth questions are sufficient to justify the verdict and judgment in favour of the plaintiff. And it is unnecessary to give an opinion on the other questions as to authority.

But in Cornfoot v. Fowke (1) every judge stated that such a question as the fifth in the present case might, upon evidence to justify it, be left to the jury as determining the liability of the principal to an action for damages for false representation, although the agent was innocent of fraud. Thus ROLFE, B., said (6 M. & W. at p. 370):

"Or if the defendant purposely employed an agent ignorant of the truth in order that such agent might innocently make a false statement believing it to be true, and might so deceive the party with whom he was dealing, he would be guilty of a fraud."

ALDERSON, G., said (ibid. at p. 372):

A "It is said that this will open a door to fraud by enabling parties in the situation of this principal, themselves conscious of objections to their premises, to appoint agents, who unconsciously may make misrepresentations to the injury of third persons. This does not follow. If the fact could be shown it would be a fraud on the part of the principal with such a motive to appoint such an agent."

B PARKE, B., said (ibid. at p. 373):

C "It must also be admitted that if the plaintiff not merely knew of the nuisance, but purposely employed an ignorant agent, suspecting that a question would be asked from him, and at the same time believing or suspecting that it would, by reason of such ignorance, be answered in the negative, the plaintiff would unquestionably be guilty of a fraud . . . ; for then the representation of the agent, which he intended to be made, would be the same as his own; and his own representation, coupled with his knowledge of its falsehood, would doubtless be a fraud."

D We think that these dicta are correct. The fifth question was, if answered in the affirmative, sufficient, in conjunction with answers to some of the other questions which have been indicated, to fix the defendant with liability in this action. That question was not improperly answered. The verdict may, therefore, properly stand without the necessity of deciding the questions which were raised as to what authority may be inferred, or what liability in respect of the agent's misrepresentations may be incurred, from the mere fact of sending a particular agent to sell goods. We are of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

E LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—I agree in the judgment just delivered; and I wish also to refer to the following observations of LORD ST. LEONARDS, in National Exchange Co. v. Drew (2), with respect to Cornfoot v. Fowke (1), and the principles applicable to cases of a like nature. He said (2 Macq. at p. 146):

F "I should say, that if in that case fraud had not been alleged, but it had been put upon misrepresentation, and the fact were, that a man, knowing that there is so serious a nuisance affecting a house as to diminish its value in such a way that no man of respectability could live in it, takes care himself not to make the contract, but leaves it to an agent whom he has no reason to suppose [to be] aware of the fact; and if, in the course of the treaty for the contract, the agent, being asked if such a fact existed, states positively, No, and the contract is executed in silence upon the point, because the purchaser's or the tenant's vigilance has been lulled to sleep upon it, and he believes the representation made to him by the agent; I say in such a case as that I should be very much shocked at the law of England if I could bring myself to believe that it would not reach the case of a person so availing himself of a misrepresentation of his own agent, who might be ignorant of the fact, although the principal himself knew it, and [having] employed the agent in order to avoid making a direct representation to the contrary, I should hope that the law of England would reach a case of that sort. I should feel no hesitation, if I had myself to decide that case, in saying that though the representation was not fraudulent—the agent not knowing that it was false—yet that, as it in fact was false, and false to the knowledge of the principal, although the agent did not know it, it ought to vitiate the contract. When, upon a matter so material to the value of the property, he left it to his agent to make the representation without informing him of so important a fact within his own knowledge, the agent making a false representation of that fact would bind the principal, and thus impeach the validity of the contract."

I It appears to me, from the evidence, that (substituting only sheep for a house) we have here to deal with the identical case which LORD ST. LEONARDS supposed.

Appeal dismissed.

Lien—Life assurance policy—Ways in which lien can be created—Contribution—Policy taken out by wife before marriage—Payment of premiums by husband—Right of husband's executor to lien on policy.

The only ways in which a lien upon the moneys secured by a policy of life insurance can be created by payment of premiums are (i) by contract with a beneficial owner of the policy; (ii) by reason of the right of trustees of the policy to an indemnity out of it, as trust property, for moneys expended by them in its preservation; (iii) by subrogation to the rights of the trustees of some person who may have advanced money at their request for the preservation of the property; (iv) by reason of the right vested in mortgagees or other persons having a charge upon the policy to add to that charge any moneys which may have been paid by them to preserve the property. Except in the above circumstances no lien is created by the payment of premiums by a mere stranger or by a part owner. Even if the law of contribution applies, the right to contribution is a personal right and there is no lien for the amount of the moneys in respect of which the right arises. Where one person allows another to expend money upon his property and stands by during such expenditure, a lien is not created unless the person who makes the payment does so under a belief in the validity of his own title.

A wife before her marriage insured her life for £5,000. On her marriage she handed the policy to her husband, and thereafter he paid the premiums, and after his death they were paid by his executors out of his estate. On a claim by the executors that because of the payments which the husband had made his estate was entitled to a lien on the policy, Action brought by the surviving executor of the testator, J. C. Leslie, deceased, against the executors of a deceased son of the testator, Mrs. Leslie (the widow of the testator), and Mr. and Mrs. Trevelyan and their children and the trustees of a settlement under which the Trevelyan family were beneficiaries, seeking a declaration of the right and interests of the plaintiff and defendants in a life insurance policy and the moneys secured by it.

On May 27, 1843, before her marriage with the testator, Mrs. Leslie insured her life for £5,000. At this time she was a widow and was entitled to an annuity of about £8,000 a year under the will of her late husband. On April 26, 1848, a voluntary post-nuptial settlement was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Leslie by which an annual sum of £800, part of Mrs. Leslie's annuity, was made payable to her husband for their joint lives, the balance being settled to her own separate use. On her marriage Mrs. Leslie handed the insurance policy to her husband, and thereafter he paid the premiums and after his death in 1877 they were paid by his executors out of his estate. In September, 1849, Mrs. Leslie had written a letter to her husband in which she expressed her intention at the right time to break the insurance policy. On Sept. 28, 1863, by a settlement made upon the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Leslie's daughter Maria with W. R. Trevelyan, Mr. Leslie covenanted with the trustees to pay to them, on his wife's death, a sum of £6,000 to be held by them on certain trusts for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Trevelyan and their issue; and he assigned to them, as security, the insurance policy upon his wife's life, and covenanted to pay the premiums thereupon until she should die. On Nov. 28, 1877, Mr. Leslie died, without having ever reduced the insurance policy into possession, and having by his will, made in November, 1863, bequeathed to the trustees of the Trevelyan settlement, on the trusts of that settlement, any surplus that there might be of the policy moneys after payment of the £6,000. He also bequeathed to his wife specifically certain property of little value, but enough to raise against her a case of election between these benefits and the policy.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 20, 1883. PEARSON, J., read the following judgment of FRY, L.J., which, by the consent of the parties, he adopted as his own, FRY, J., having been appointed a lord justice of appeal since the conclusion of the argument: As Mrs. Leslie is still alive the question would not require immediate determination were it not for the fact that the testator's will raises against his wife a case of election, and that she is entitled to know between what properties she is called on to elect. The plaintiff contends that the payments made by Mr. Leslie have created a lien or charge upon the money secured by the policy to the extent of the moneys paid. The defendants deny this proposition. The question thus raised has been fully discussed, and it becomes necessary to consider the various arguments which have been adduced and the numerous cases which have been cited upon the point.

In my opinion, a lien may be created upon the moneys secured by a policy of payment of premiums in the following cases: first, by contract with a beneficial owner of the policy; secondly, by reason of the right of the trustees to an indemnity out of the trust property for money expended by them in its preservation; thirdly, by subrogation to the rights of the trustees of some person who may have advanced money at their request for the preservation of the property; fourthly, by reason of the right vested in mortgagees or other persons having a charge upon the policy to add to that charge any moneys which have been paid by them to preserve the policy.

An instance of the first class of cases to which I have referred, viz., the creation of a lien by contract with the beneficial owner is to be found in Aylwin v. Witty (1), where KINDERSLEY, V.-C., held that where a mortgagor had contracted with the mortgagee to pay the premiums, and there were sureties for the performance of this contract by the mortgagor, and the sureties had been called upon and had paid the premiums, they were entitled as against the mortgagor to a lien upon the policy moneys. It is obvious that in this case the sureties were, by contract with the principal debtor, entitled to the benefit of all the securities which the mortgagee could have enforced, and among others to a charge for the premiums paid. The second and third classes of cases are well illustrated by Clack v. Holland (2), in which it was held that trustees who paid moneys under circumstances which gave them no right to a charge could not create a charge in favour of any third person from whom they borrowed moneys. To the same class may be referred Gill v. Downing (3), in which mortgagees whose title as such was good after, and only after, the death of the tenant for life were held entitled to a lien during the subsistence of the tenancy for life. The mortgagees were put by subrogation in the place of the trustees. Again, in Todd v. Moorhouse (4), the right of trustees to create a lien by subrogation of their rights was recognised, and it was determined that a person paying at the request of the trustees did not lose the right to the lien

A simply because the trustees might possibly have taken some other course to preserve the property. Such appear to me to be the classes of cases in which a lien is created by payment of premiums. But I am unable to see that the plaintiff has brought the case within any of them. There were no trustees for Mr. Leslie and his wife to whose rights he could be subrogated, and there was no contract between him and her under which the payments were made.

B I am further of opinion that, except under the circumstances to which I have referred, no lien is created by the payment of the premiums by a mere stranger or by a part owner. I will first consider the case of payments by a mere stranger. On principle it is difficult, if not impossible, to see why such payments, which when made without contract or request are a mere impertinence, should create a lien upon the property. It is evident that in themselves they would not even
C create a ground of personal action against the person eased by the payment, for it is certain that moneys paid by A. for B. give no right of action against B. unless they are paid upon his request. In the next place, the law relating to confusion appears to me strongly to show that no such right would exist. If I pour my gold into your heap, or put my silver into your melting-pot, or turn my corn into your granary, I have no right to an account or any relief against you, but on the contrary
D I have actually transferred the property in what was mine to the person with whose property I have mingled it. Again, the authorities appear to me to be clear upon this point. In Burridge v. Row (5), KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., used the following language (1 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. at p. 191):

E "Nothing that has been stated to me has had the effect of persuading me that, without contract for that purpose, the mere fact of making payments of the premiums, however necessary that might be for the preservation of the property, would give the party making those payments a title to the property."

It may be perfectly true, as was contended before me, that Alderman Winchester was during the period between 1828 and 1832 in the position of a person having no interest in the policy, and that the decree in Burridge v. Row (5), by giving him
F a lien for payments made during that period, has gone beyond the principle enunciated by the learned Vice-Chancellor.

The important question is not whether the decree was accurate, but what was the principle of law enunciated by the judge. In Clack v. Holland (2), SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., understood Burridge v. Row (5) as laying down the principle for which I have cited it. His Lordship said (19 Beav. at p. 277):

G "That case lays down a principle in accordance with my view of this case, and supports Pinkett v. Wright (6), and shows that a mere stranger by paying premiums on a policy cannot acquire a lien upon it. He can only acquire a lien by some contract with the persons beneficially interested in it, or with the trustee, where the trustee himself might have obtained a lien."

H It has, however, been contended that a right is created in favour of a stranger making the payments, upon the principle of salvage; and it is said to be contrary to natural equity that one person should gain by another man's loss. What is the state of the authorities upon this point? In the first place, whether there be such a doctrine as that of salvage applicable to cases of this description at all was doubted by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Aylwin v. Witty (1), to which I have already
I referred. In the next place, with regard to West v. Reid (7) and Shearman v. British Empire Assurance Co. (8), I will only say that I retain the opinion which I expressed with regard to those cases in Saunders v. Dunman (9). Re Tharp (10), before LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., has been referred to as an authority for the proposition that there is some general doctrine of salvage in cases of this kind. It appears to me, however, that the Lord Chancellor was referring to a practice in the Irish law of conveyancing which probably has its basis in agreement, and that if it is meant to assert, as the language would rather imply, that an ultimate mortgagor making payments for the renewal of a lease is entitled to priority over his mortgagees, the proposition would seem to be inconsistent with the general law of the land. A

In the next place, with regard to payments made by a part owner, it appears to me that, except by contract, such payments give no title to the person making them against the other part owner or part owners of the policy. That the payments by a mortgagor, who in equity is a part owner with the mortgagee, create no lien as against the mortgagee, was determined by LORD ROMILLY, M.R., in Norris v. Caledonian Insurance Co. (11). And, generally speaking, it is clear that money laid out by a tenant for life in improvements on the estate creates no lien against the remainderman. Again, in Pennell v. Millar (12), SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., had to deal with a case in which A., the owner of policies, had as part of a transaction voidable for fraud assured them to B., and had covenanted to keep them up; B., claiming under this assignment, had paid premiums. A. instituted an action to set aside the transaction on the ground of fraud, and the Master of the Rolls determined that the assignment was a valid security for the moneys actually advanced, and not for the premiums paid by B., which was a voluntary payment. In this case it is evident that, until the transaction was avoided, A. and B. were both possessed of interests in the policies, and yet the payment by one of the persons so interested was held to create no lien as against the other. C D

An argument was urged from the law of contribution. But, in the first place, the law of contribution arises only between persons joined for a common purpose, or persons who stand in the position of tenants in common, or co-partners. In the next place, it is plain that the right to contribution is a personal right, and the remedy is a personal remedy, and that there is no lien for the amount of the moneys in respect of which the right to contribution arises. This was determined by LORD ELDON, after great consideration, in the case of part owners of a ship, in Ex parte Young (13) and Ex parte Harrison (14), in which he overruled the previously expressed opinion of LORD HARDWICKE [in Doddington v. Hallet (15)] to the contrary; and the same proposition, that there is no lien for the contributed moneys, is supported by Kay v. Johnston (16) and Teasdale v. Sanderson (17). There are, however, it must be admitted, two cases which look in the opposite direction. The first of those is Swan v. Swan (18), where the Court of Exchequer, sitting as a court of equity, refused to grant partition to one co-tenant except upon the terms of the plaintiff allowing a lien for the expenditure of his co-tenant in permanent improvements. But it appears doubtful how far this case has been generally followed, and it does not appear to me to be consistent with the opinion expressed by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in Teasdale v. Sanderson (17). The second case is Hamilton v. Denny (19); there a lease had been made to A. and B. as joint tenants. B. had settled his moiety of the property. A. had made a payment of the renewal fines, and he was held to be entitled to a lien on B.'s settled share. The decision was placed upon two grounds. It was said to be like the case of payments by a mortgagee, and it was said that the payments by A. were entitled to the same benefit as if they had been payments made by a trustee. It is perhaps not perfectly easy to see the strict analogy between these two cases and the case then before the court. In my view, these cases are not sufficient to establish any such general proposition as that the right to contribution creates any lien on the property in respect of which it has been made, and they certainly are insufficient to support the plaintiff's case. For in those authorities the submission to a lien was required from the plaintiff as a term of other relief which he sought, while in the case now before me the plaintiff is affirmatively asserting his right. E F G H I

It has been further urged that the plaintiff is entitled to a lien on the ground of the acquiescence by the other persons interested in the policy in the payments made by Mr. Leslie, and it is said that where one person allows another to expend money upon his property, and stands by during such expenditure, a lien is created in favour of the person making the expenditure. But it is certain that no such lien is created except in the case of a person who makes the payment under a

A belief in the validity of his own title. In the present case there is nothing whatever to show that Mr. Leslie acted under any mistake with regard to his rights in the policy, and it is certain that during a considerable part of the period covered by his payments he was in possession of the opinion of counsel as to his legal rights.

Another argument pressed upon me by the plaintiff was derived from the relation of tenant for life and remainderman. It is well established that, if a tenant for life renews leaseholds, and dies before the expiration of the term, his estate is entitled to a lien on the interests in remainder, proportionate to the unexpired portion of the renewed term. But the equities governing the relation of tenant for life and remainderman are peculiar, and I fail to see any analogy between the case of a tenant for life making such a payment and the case of Mr. Leslie paying premiums on a policy over which he had full control at every moment of his life, which, I repeat, but for his contract on his daughter's marriage, he could have sold or surrendered without consent of his wife.

In my judgment, the arguments of the plaintiff in support of his lien fail, and I conclude that from the time of the marriage down to the year 1863 Mr. Leslie made the payments in question in maintenance of his own right in the policy, and that from 1863 he made the payments in pursuance of his covenant with his daughter's trustees, but that in no case did he make them by reason of any contract between himself and his wife, or by reason of any mistake of his title to the policy, and consequently that his estate is entitled to no lien on the policy moneys as against her. I understand from counsel that the defendant Mrs. Leslie consents to a declaration that the policy shall stand as a security for the £6,000 secured by the Trevelyan settlement, and I believe also some arrangement has been come to as to the premiums paid since Mr. Leslie's death. I will, therefore, make, by consent, a declaration to the effect of the arrangement between the parties, and then declare that, except so far as Mr. Leslie's estate is benefited by the previous declaration, the plaintiff has no right or interest in the policy, but that, subject to the said declaration, the policy has accrued to Mrs. Leslie by survivorship, and I direct the plaintiff to pay the costs of the action.

Land—Right to support—Assignee of land from railway company—Right of mine-owner to work mine when surface owned by railway company—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 20), ss. 77, 78, 79.

Under powers given by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, a railway company compulsorily acquired land excepting mines which were worked beneath the surface by the defendant. Subsequently, the company found that this land was superfluous and sold it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for working the mines in such a way as to let down the surface belonging to the plaintiff and injuring buildings thereon.

Held: since the defendant could have worked out the mines so as to let down the surface when the surface was owned by the railway company by virtue of ss. 77, 78, and 79 of the Act of 1845, the plaintiff, whose title to the land was derived from the railway company, was in the same position and had no right to support from the defendant's land in respect of the surface.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (DENMAN, J., MANISTY, J., dissenting), on a rule for the new trial of an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for damages for working his mines in such a way as to withdraw support from the plaintiff's land and five houses thereon.

C At the trial of the action before WATKIN WILLIAMS, J., at Shrewsbury, the jury found for the plaintiff for £465 2s. The defendant obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, but the rule was discharged by the Divisional Court who were divided in opinion. The defendant appealed.

D By s. 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 :

"The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby."

E By s. 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 [now incorporated in s. 15 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923] :

F "If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway, or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance, or, where no distance shall be prescribed, forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention so to do, thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same; and if the company, and such owner, lessee, or occupier, do not agree as to the amount of such compensation, the same shall be settled as in other cases of disputed compensation."

G By s. 79 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 [now incorporated into s. 15 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923] :

H "If before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not state their willingness to treat with such owner, lessee, or occupier for the payment of such compensation, it shall be lawful for him to work the said mines or any part thereof for which the company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, so that the same be done in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same shall be situate; and if any damage or obstruction be occasioned to the railway or works by improper working of such mines, the same shall be forthwith repaired or removed, as the case may require, and such damage made good, by the owner, lessee, or occupier of such mines or minerals, and at his own expense; and if such repair or removal be not forthwith done, or, if the company shall so think fit, without waiting for the same to be done by such owner, lessees, or occupier, it shall be lawful for the company to execute the same, and recover from such owner, lessee, or occupier the expense occasioned thereby, by action in any of the superior courts."

SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—In this case the owner of certain land sued the owner of the mines for working his mines in such a way as to let down the surface, and injure the buildings thereon. The plaintiff's title was proved to have arisen in this way. The land and mines originally belonged to one Penson, who granted a lease of the mines to the defendant. I will assume that, on the true construction of the lease, as between the defendant and Penson, the defendant was bound to work the mines so as not to let down the surface. The meaning of the lease is that all the minerals are sold by the owner, and are to be so worked that the surface shall not be let down. As to the rights of the lessee, it is said that he must leave some coal, and so he must, that is, he must leave enough for the support of the surface. The railway company desired to buy the land under their compulsory powers. If it remained under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, alone they would be bound to buy the land and the mines. But by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the railway company has an option, and may insist on buying the land, and not buying the mines. There is a power of election. It comes to this, that, in popular language, the railway company are entitled to buy the surface, but they may buy all the land except the mines, so that where the mines are excepted out of the conveyance to the railway company, if a person dug under the land in a part which was not mines he would be a trespasser as against the company.

We have to consider the position of a railway company which has exercised this option, and has bought everything except the mines, and we can try it, as the House of Lords did before there was any decision on the question, on the mere construction of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. It depends on the true construction of ss. 77, 78, and 79 of that statute. The question on the construction of those sections is, what are the rights of a railway company which has elected not to purchase the minerals, with regard to the owner of the minerals? It would seem that he and the railway company have two converse rights, which taken together, make up the whole ownership of the land. A question might have been raised if s. 77 stood alone, whether there could be by implication a right reserved to the railway company to the natural support necessary to maintain the railway. If there were a grant to the railway company of all the land except the mines, it may be that inasmuch as the owner would be selling to build a railway, it would be natural when he sold for a particular purpose, and right and reasonable, that he should not sell the land on such terms that he would be entitled to work the mines so as to let down the railway. But that would be because the land would be granted, but on s. 77 there is no grant by the landowner to the railway company: they take the land, and insist that he shall keep the minerals. If that section stood alone I should be inclined to agree with LORD WESTBURY in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (1), that there would be no implied right to support, but it is not necessary to determine this point, for s. 77 is followed by the other sections to which I have referred.

To my mind we have a direct decision of the House of Lords as to the true construction of the statute in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (1). The circumstances of that case were not the same as those here, but in looking to that case for guidance we are bound to see whether it fairly raises the question of construction, and if it does so, we must see what the House of Lords held to be the construction of the statute, and then resume the consideration of the present case, and apply that construction to the facts. It is impossible to say that the question as to the construction of the statute with regard to the rights of the railway com-

A pany and the landowner, when the railway company has bought the lands without taking the mines, did not come before the House of Lords in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (1). The House of Lords decided what is the true construction of the three sections to which I have referred with regard to the rights of the railway company and those of the owner of the mines, and all the Lords who took part in that decision came to the same conclusion, namely, that the legislature, knowing the natural right of the owner of the land to support, and knowing what would be the implication in the case of a grant of all except the minerals, came to the conclusion that the statute was meant to alter the ordinary law, and that inasmuch as railway companies obtained a right of choice whether they would purchase the mines or not, the meaning is that when the railway company exercises a choice and does not take the minerals, then all their rights of support are gone, and the minerals may, as against the railway company, be thoroughly worked out, whether the effect is to injure the railway or not, the only obligation on the landowner being to get out the minerals in the ordinary way.

The boon is partly to one and partly to the other. The necessity of buying all the minerals is postponed, and so the company can keep their money, for the owner may never want to work the minerals that is in favour of the railway company, but it would be unjust to give them that power and not to give some compensation to the mineowner, and, therefore, the House of Lords came to the conclusion that the legislature had guarded him by providing that if the railway company purchased the land without the minerals the owner may work out all the minerals. That again would be too much against the railway company, for the landowner could let down the railway, and, therefore, protection is given to the railway company to countervail this right, for by s. 78 whoever is the owner of or entitled to work the minerals shall not work them until after thirty days' notice. There again an option is given to the company, for they can send their surveyor into the mine to inspect and advise them as to whether it is their interest to prevent the owner from working the mines, and they have a right to purchase the minerals. The Act says that the railway company's rights may be exercised not only within the thirty days, but at any time before the owner has worked the mines.

The House of Lords came to the conclusion that if all the company do is to exercise their option on the first purchase of the land, the minerals may be got to the last inch, whether the effect is to let down the railway or not, and if they do not prevent this in the way pointed out by the statute it is their own fault. LORD CHELMSFORD says (L.R. 2 H.L. at p. 38):

G "This section appears to me to leave the mineowner to work his mine exactly as he would if the surface belonged to him, unless the railway company chooses to prevent him by expressing willingness to make him compensation."

LORD CRANWORTH says (ibid. at p. 40):

H "It was obviously the intention of the legislature, in making these provisions, to create a new code as to the relation between mineowners and railway companies where lands were compulsorily taken for the purpose of making a railway. The object of the statute evidently was to get rid of all the ordinary law on the subject, and compel the owner to sell the surface, and if any mines were so near the surface that they must be taken for the purposes of the railway, to compel him to sell them, but not to compel him to sell anything more. The land was to be dealt with just as if there were no mines to be considered, nothing but the surface. That being so, justice obviously requires that when the mineowner thinks it beneficial to him to work his mines, and proceeds to do so, he should be just in the same position as if he had never sold any part of the surface at all."

I In other words, the mines may be worked as against the railway company just as if they were in the hands of the owner of the surface. I need not read what LORD WESTBURY says, but he takes the same view, and says he is astonished that anyone should think otherwise.

That determines the right of the mineowner, and, necessarily, the converse right of the railway company. Where the railway company buy all except the mines, and do nothing more, what they get is all the land except the mines, subject to this, that the mines may be worked as against them, if they are worked in a particular way, even so as to let down the railway. Then the defect in the plaintiff's case is a defect in the plaintiff's right, and it is immaterial what are the rights of the defendant. It may be that he has done wrong to his lessor, but if he has not invaded the rights of the plaintiff that does not affect the present case. A B

I think the case ought to be decided in favour of the defendant, on the ground that the defendant has not derogated from the plaintiff's right, and I agree with MANISTY, J., rather than with DENMAN, J. The result will be that the plaintiff will have judgment for one-fifth of the amount recovered at the trial, and will have the general costs of the action, diminished by so much of the costs as were caused by his claim in respect of more than one house. The defendant having succeeded in his appeal will have the costs of the appeal. C

BOWEN, L.J.—This is an intricate matter to deal with. The subject-matter of the case is the right to support, which is an obscure right, even where there is a contract. The plaintiff is the ultimate purchaser of superfluous land, and he claims under the railway company, and brings this action for letting down the land. The defendant's answer is, "You have no right, because you claim only under the railway company, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, liberates me from liability." Is that a good answer? WATKIN WILLIAMS, J., thought not, and the Divisional Court was divided in opinion; so the case comes to us. D

We must keep distinct the different ways in which people get a right to support of the surface of land. Prima facie, the owner has all from the sky down to the centre of the earth, and certain rights of support exist where nothing is known of the origin of the rights. Where land is divided so that the part above belongs to one person, and the part below to another, prima facie the land above is entitled to support from the land below. That is where you do not know the origin of the rights. Where the origin is known the rights depend on the deed or Act of Parliament which severs the upper land from the lower. This must necessarily be so, for the owner of the whole may do what he likes with it. He may grant the minerals, reserving the right of support, or may grant them so that the grantee is entitled to let down the surface, or he may demise the minerals and reserve the right to support, or he may demise them so as to give the lessee the right to destroy the surface. One must look at the instrument to see how far the demise goes, and how far any right to support is reserved. Where there are mere words of demise, and the right to support is conceded, I should say that the general words of demise would give all the minerals, reserving the right to support of the surface. So looking at the demise from Penson to Clayton, I should think here that the lessee was the occupier of all the coal. E F G

This view seems to me to be consistent with the language used by LORD WENSLEYDALE in Rowbotham v. Wilson (2), and which is cited by BLACKBURN, J., in Smith v. Darby (3). I call attention to this passage because counsel for the plaintiff's ingenious argument appears to me to ignore it. LORD WENSLEYDALE says (8 H.L.Cas. at p. 360): H

"There is no doubt that prima facie the owner of the surface is entitled to the surface itself and all below it ex jure naturæ; and those who claim the property in the minerals below, or any interest in them, must do so by some grant from or conveyance by him, or it may be from the Crown, as suggested by LORD CAMPBELL in the case of Humphries v. Brogden (4). The right of the grantee to the minerals by whomsoever granted, must depend upon the terms of the deed by which they are conveyed or reserved when the surface is conveyed. Prima facie, it must be presumed that the minerals are to be enjoyed, and therefore that a power to get them must also be granted or reserved as a I

A necessary incident. It is one of the cases put by SHEPPARD (TOUCHSTONE, chap. 5, p. 89) in illustration of the maxim, quando aliquid conceditur, conceditur etiam et id sine quo res ipsa non esse potuit, that by grant of mines is granted the power to dig them. A similar proposition prima facie arises that the owner of the mines is not to injure the owner of the soil above by getting them if it can be avoided. But it rarely happens that these mutual rights are not precisely ascertained and settled by the deed by which the right to the mines is acquired; and then the only question would be as to the construction of that deed, which may vary in each case."

C Applying what I have said to the proprietorship of the surface, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, one must not fall into the fallacy of thinking that it means the plane surface; I mean all the land except the mines. Then what classes of surface owners are there? First, the surface owner may have both the mines and the surface; or, secondly, you may have a surface owner entitled to the ordinary right of support, not because there is a deed, but because you only know that he is the surface owner; or, thirdly, the surface owner may have a right to support created by a document, where it must depend on the construction of the document; or, fourthly, the surface owner may have no right to support because it has been given away. These being the four classes of owners, a purchaser appears.

E Let us first take a case that is not under the Act of Parliament; what does the purchaser get from the surface owner? First, only what he has to give, and secondly only what he intends to give. Then how are we to know what is intended to be given? We must look at the deed and construe it, or it may be that the deed is silent, and then in each case the law assists. The presumption is that the instrument is intended to be effectual for the purpose for which it was executed; in the words of the maxim cited by LORD WENSLEYDALE in the passage I have just read, quando aliquid conceditur, conceditur etiam et id sine quo res ipsa non esse potuit. Now take each class and see what is passed by implication. First, where the surface owner has all the land, consider what the law implies as passing by a conveyance. If the sale were not to a railway company, it would be what is wanted for the natural enjoyment of the land. In the case of a railway company it might go rather further, and what is wanted for the support of the railway might be held to pass. As to the second class I have referred to, where the owner has only the surface, the right to support passes, but only what he has got, and therefore only the right to the support of the surface. Thirdly, where there is a severance by a document, there if the surface owner can give the right of support he gives what is required. Fourthly, where there is no right to support, there the owner can only give the surface. As to the third case, I wish to point out that a person who has a right to support created by deed as between himself and the lessee of the mine, and transfers the surface to a railway company, transfers the right to support as well, not because the covenant runs as between vendor and purchaser, but because the purchaser is entitled to the benefit of the covenant, if it was the intention of the parties that he should have it.

I I will proceed to see how the Act of Parliament touches the question. The sections must not be treated as applying only as between the railway company and one class of surface owners. It must be remembered that there are the several classes which I have referred to, and also that the sections are intended for the protection both of the railway company, and of the surface owners, because some surface owners cannot give the railway company protection. I think s. 79 is the cardinal section. It is the charter of all mineowners' rights within forty yards of the railway, as against all railways. I had some doubt at first as to its effect outside the limit of forty yards, and still I am not sure whether that question is covered by the decision in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (1), but the question does not arise here, for the mines we have to deal with are within the limit of forty yards. In Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (1) the surface owner belonged to the first class which I have referred to, and the question was what compensation he was entitled to, and on what principle it was to be assessed—whether he was entitled to compensation as for the right to support of the surface, or of the surface and the railway, or of nothing. The House of Lords decided that he ought to be compensated on the basis of having parted with the right of support to nothing. This shows that s. 79 applies in the widest terms to surface owners who also are mineowners. A

Here the owner was not within class number one, but why should not the same principle apply where the right to the minerals is severed from the right to the surface by a document or demise? Is it a distinction which makes any difference in this case? This point seems to have occurred to the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Fletcher (5), where COCKBURN, C.J., says (5 H. & N. at p. 698): B

“If indeed prior to the conveyance there was any separation of the surface soil from the minerals, the right of support would no doubt belong to the company, because if a landowner parts with the surface soil he does so subject to the obligation of dealing with the substratum so as not to disturb the super-incumbent soil. In such case, the landowners, having parted with the surface, and there being attached to the ownership of the soil the right to the support of the stratum below, would not be entitled to any compensation for the loss they may sustain in not working the minerals; but that is not the question which we have now to consider.” C

That is an obiter dictum favourable to the plaintiff rather than to the defendant, but can it be supported? Take the broadest case; a surface owner conveying to a railway company, and a mineowner who is bound to support the surface, not by any deed, but because there is nothing to show the contrary—that is class number two. Apply s. 79, and see if it is possible without altering the words of the section to limit the rights of the mineowners. Section 79 applies to every owner and occupier of a mine within forty yards of the line of railway. D

If what is suggested is true of class number two, it is also true of class number three, and I think on the whole, though not without some difficulty, that we must interpret s. 79 in the broad way adopted by the Master of the Rolls. Several objections have been pressed upon us; first, that the surface may always be injured unless there is danger to the works; but that did not hinder the House of Lords from construing the Act as they did. Then it is said that it would release the hands of a mineowner who was under an implied covenant to leave support for the surface; but that does not follow as to the original lessor, for the privity of contract may remain. The scope of the Act is to give the railway company protection for their works, and that the mineowner, if the railway company do not insist on their protection, should be free to exercise proprietary rights as if he were next to an ordinary owner of land. For these reasons I am of opinion that the answer to the plaintiff's case is that he cannot sue. E

Estoppel—Estoppel by record—Question in issue in former proceedings—Compromise of probate action—Probate of will granted—Will subsequently held to have been forged—Compromise set aside by order of Chancery Division—Further action propounding another will—Defendants estopped from denying forgery.

In an action in the Probate Division the plaintiff alleged that a will propounded by the defendants had been obtained by undue influence. This action was eventually compromised by all the parties interested under the will and the will was admitted to probate. In a subsequent action in the Queen's Bench Division it was held that the will was a forgery and that the compromise had been obtained by the fraud of one of the defendants who had been a party or privy to the forgery. In further proceedings a judge of the Chancery Division declared the compromise to be invalid and set it aside. An action was then commenced by the plaintiff propounding a subsequent will revoking the earlier will.

Held: in the proceedings in the Chancery Division the forgery was the question in issue and was not a question which arose incidentally, and, therefore, the defendants were estopped by the judgment in those proceedings from denying the forgery.

Appeal from an order of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., reported 9 P.D. 70, in an action brought by the plaintiff suing as the executor of an alleged will of James Whalley deceased, against the defendants Thomas and Gunnell, who claimed to be the only persons interested under an earlier will of the deceased, to revoke the probate of the will obtained by the defendants on the grounds that this will was a forgery. A

The plaintiff applied for an order that points of law raised by the pleadings relating to whether the defendants were estopped by a decision of the Chancery Division from denying that a compromise of earlier proceedings between the parties had been obtained by fraud, or that the will propounded by the defendants was a forgery, should be heard and disposed of before the trial under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 3. B
SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., made an order to this effect, and the defendants appealed.

Anderson for the defendants.

C. Russell, Q.C., and Middleton for the plaintiff.

BAGGALLAY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendants has addressed an able argument to the court, and has referred to numerous authorities; but I am of opinion that the President came to a right conclusion. No doubt the action in the Chancery Division and this action were brought for different purposes; it was not the object of the action in the Chancery Division to set aside the probate which had been granted by the Probate Division, but the court was asked to set aside the compromise, and it could not do that except upon the ground that the will was a forgery. That fact was necessary to be determined before the court could give its decision. I agree with what the President says in his judgment: C D

“The conclusive effect of the verdict and judgment in the action tried before MANISTY, J., is not confined to the bare issue whether the agreement of compromise was obtained by fraud, but extends to that which it was necessary in that action to decide, and which was in fact decided as the basis of the decision.” E

It was argued that an estoppel can only arise as to a matter which can be properly dealt with by the court, and that the question whether the will was valid was not one which could be properly dealt with by the Chancery Division. There may be cases in which that argument might prevail, but it cannot apply to a case like the present, where all the parties interested in the question whether the will was valid were parties to the action in the Chancery Division, and were bound by the judgment in that action. If the parties had been different it might have led to a different conclusion. But that is not the case here. The appeal must be dismissed. F

COTTON, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the defendants are estopped from denying that the will is a forgery. I am of opinion that this case does not come within the rule that parties are not estopped by a decision which is only incidentally involved in the judgment in a previous action. The forgery was the question in issue in the Chancery action. The object for which it was brought was to declare that the will was a forgery, and that Thomas was a party or privy to the forgery, and that with knowledge of that fact he entered into the compromise. G H
The jury found that it was so, and the court gave judgment in accordance with their verdict, and gave consequential relief and set aside the compromise on that very ground. But it is contended that the action in the Chancery Division was brought for a different object to that sought by the present action, and that the purpose for which the present action is brought is not within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division. That is so, but the action was between the same parties, and when the very point has been decided in one action it would be wrong to allow the same parties to litigate it over again in a different court, when all parties interested in contending that the will was a forgery were present before the court in the former action. Although the Chancery Division has no jurisdiction to revoke the probate of the will, it has full jurisdiction to decide that it was a forgery. I

It is not necessary to go into the authorities on this subject. It is clear to me that the question of forgery was not decided incidentally. R. v. Hutchins (1)

A explains the meaning of the term "incidentally arising." In that case it was held that the magistrates had no power to decide whether a certain street was a highway against parties who were not before them, although they could decide it between the overseers and the parties applying. As against absent parties, the point only arose incidentally. That seems to have been the principal reason given in the judgment. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., says (6 P.D. at p. 305):

B "The justices before whom the complaint of the urban authority came on May 7, 1874, had no jurisdiction to adjudicate directly or immediately between those parties (or between any parties whatever) on the question whether Mill Street was or was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants of Bradford at large. That was at the most a matter 'incidentally cognisable' by them. No conclusion which they might form upon it could establish (in the one case) C or disprove (in the other) any such liability as against or in favour of the inhabitants. Their only jurisdiction was to make or refuse the order for payment of a certain sum of money then claimed as the defendant's statutable quota of certain expenses at that time incurred by the urban authority."

But here whether the will was a forgery was the real question which was to be decided as against all parties to the action. It was not, therefore, a question arising D incidentally. I am of opinion that the President was right in holding that the defendants were estopped.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the principle established in the Duchess of Kingston's Case (2) is clear enough, but the difficulty lies in applying it to each particular case. Let us look at the facts in this case. E The relief sought in the action in the Chancery Division depended entirely upon the question whether the will was a forgery. That was the real issue in the action; it did not arise merely incidentally, and, when we apply the principle of the Duchess of Kingston's Case (2), it seems clear that it is within that authority. Counsel for the defendants contended that, inasmuch as a judge of the Chancery Division could not have decided that the will ought not to be admitted to probate, F the defendants are not estopped in this action. But the action in the Chancery Division had to be decided on the ground that the will was, or that it was not, a forgery. Therefore, that was the issue in the action. That being so, I think the defendants are estopped from now denying that it was a forgery.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Bacon, V.-C.), July 8, 1884]

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Rectification—Lease executed on terms of a written offer containing mistake by offeror.

The plaintiff, who intended to reserve the first floor of one of three houses which he wished to let for his own use as a shop, by mistake offered in writing to let to the defendant all the floors of all three houses at an annual rent of £500. In earlier negotiations between the parties the plaintiff had made it clear that he was reserving the first floor for himself. The defendant accepted the written offer and a lease was executed in the same terms, including all the floors of each house. In an action by the plaintiff for rectification or annulment of the lease,

Held: it not having been definitely established whether or not there had been a common mistake, the lease should be annulled, but in the circumstances of the case it would be right and just and consistent with authority to give the defendant the alternative of agreeing to the rectification of the lease to exclude from its operation the first floor in question.

Notes. This decision has been criticised (see 26 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 91 4note (b)), but in Solle v. Butcher, [1949] 2 All E.R. 1122, DENNING, L.J., referred to it as an example which should be followed.

Webster v. Cecil (1861), 30 Beav. 62; 54 E.R. 812; 35 Digest (Repl.) 115, 140.

Action by the plaintiff Caroline Matilda Paget, against the defendant, Wesley Marshall, claiming a declaration that a lease made on Dec. 21, 1883, between the parties ought not, according to the true intent of the parties, to have comprised the first floor of 48, Aldersgate Street, London, and that the defendant should be ordered to elect between the annulment of the lease and its rectification.

The plaintiff was the lessee of premises numbered 48, 49, and 50, Aldersgate Street, London, where she carried on business with her sons under the name of R. G. Paget & Son. In the latter part of 1883 Richard William Paget, acting as the plaintiff's agent, entered into negotiations with the defendant Wesley Marshall, a wholesale manufacturing furrier, with the view of a lease being granted to him of portions of Nos. 48, 49, and 50, Aldersgate Street. In her statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that it was verbally agreed that the defendant should accept a lease for twenty-one years at £500 a year, of the second, third, and fourth floors of Nos. 48 and the first, second, third and fourth floors of Nos. 49 and 50, Aldersgate Street, and that the agreement should be put into writing. On Nov. 13, 1883, R. W. Paget wrote to the defendant as follows:

- A "Dear Sir—We will let you on lease for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years the upper part of Nos. 48, 49, 50, Aldersgate Street, consisting of first, second, third, and fourth floors (reserving for our own use one of the closets on the second floor landing, also the right of passage to roof) for the sum of £500 per annum and taxes. We await your acceptance of the above terms.—Yours obediently, R. G. PAGET & SON."
- B It was alleged that the first floor of No. 48, Aldersgate Street was included by inadvertence, and contrary to the intention of the plaintiff or her agent, and that the defendant knew it to be so. On Nov. 14, 1883, the defendant wrote accepting the offer contained in the letter of the previous day. The indenture of lease of the premises was dated Dec. 21, 1883, and by it the plaintiff demised to the defendant
- C "all those the first, second, third and fourth floors of and in the messuages or warehouses and premises situate on the east side of Aldersgate Street, in the city of London, and having a frontage of 52 ft. 9 in. (more or less), and known as Nos. 48, 49, and 50, Aldersgate Street aforesaid,"
- D from Dec. 25, 1883, for twenty-one years, except and reserved out of the same premises the lavatory between the first and second floors of the said premises, and the sole right of passage to the roof (which said lavatory and right of passage it was thereby declared were for the exclusive use of the plaintiff) at the yearly rent of £500. The first floor of No. 48 was separated from the premises intended to be leased by a closed partition; and the only access thereto was through the premises occupied by the plaintiff on the ground floor of the same building. Moreover, by the terms of the lease under which the plaintiff held, she was precluded from making any openings in the partition. The plaintiff offered to amend the lease or to accept a surrender of the term and indemnify the defendant against loss. On the defendant refusing, the plaintiff instituted the action on Jan. 9, 1884.
- E By his defence the defendant denied the alleged verbal agreement, and stated that he had offered during the negotiations to take a lease either of the first, second, third, and fourth floors of Nos. 48, 49, and 50, or a lease of the second, third, and fourth floors of No. 48, and the first, second, third, and fourth floors of Nos. 49 and 50, together with some other room which he could use as a packing-room, and that he considered the letter of Nov. 13 to contain an offer naturally arising from the previous negotiations. The defendant further submitted that the partition between Nos. 48 and 49, being only lath and plaster, could easily be removed on a licence being obtained from the original lessors without any structural damage;
- F that there was no mistake, but that if there was it was a unilateral mistake and not common to both parties. By his counterclaim he asked for compensation and damages if the lease should be annulled, and reduction of rent if it should be rectified. It was in evidence that the defendant considered a packing-room of great importance, and would not have taken the premises on the terms of the lease without one; that he wished to have a board with his name on it placed all round the first floor of Nos. 48, 49, 50, but that the plaintiff's agent replied that
- H he would not allow it to be put up round the first floor of No. 48. It appeared that when the draft lease was sent to the defendant's solicitors an objection was made to the covenant for the lessee to do external repairs. A note was made by Messrs. Prideaux & Sons, the plaintiff's solicitors, in the margin of the draft, in these words:
- I "The lessee is taking all but the ground floor, and in such cases in our experience it is usual for him to do external repairs."
- Evidence was also adduced as to the value of the premises, exclusive of and including the first floor of No. 48. A model of the building was produced in court, in which the whole of the first, second, third, and fourth floors of the building, exclusive of the first floor of No. 48, were coloured blue, and the first floor of No. 48 was coloured brown.

Hemming, Q.C., and H. J. Hood for the plaintiff.

Marten, Q.C., and J. D. Davenport for the defendant.

BACON, V.-C.—In all these cases on the law of mistake it is very difficult to settle a principle, because you have to rely upon the statements of parties interested, and upon the not very accurate recollections of what took place between them. But the law I take to be as stated by counsel for the plaintiff. If it is a case of common mistake—a common mistake as to one stipulation in many provisions contained in a settlement or any other deed—that, upon proper evidence, may be rectified. The court has the power to do so, and it is very often exercised. The other class of cases is one of what are called unilateral mistakes; and there, if the court is satisfied that the true intention of one of the parties was to do one thing, or omit to do one thing; that will not be enforced against him, but the parties will be restored to their original position, and the agreement will be treated as if it had never been entered into. That I take to be the clear conclusion to be drawn from the authorities. The old law is very much as was stated in that very excellent treatise by MR. KERR ON FRAUD AND MISTAKE, and anybody who has read that book must be well satisfied with the diligence, industry, intelligence, and sagacity with which he has acquitted himself of the task he undertook, but of course I cannot consider it as an authority upon which I can rely, although I listen to it with interest and respect.

The case before me is in a very narrow compass. The plaintiff has taken the lease of a site of property from the Goldsmiths' Co., upon a contract to build upon it a very valuable and commodious structure, and he did so; and his plans are in evidence, and it is quite clear what his intention was. He built two separate tenements, which were let to two separate tenants; he kept a third, intending to occupy it for himself; and the fourth part, that coloured blue on the model, he had to let, when the negotiation commenced with the defendant. So that the subject in dispute is beyond all question. The two shops, Nos. 49 and 50, were separate and distinct things, as separate as if they had been in some other street; and the third, No. 48, was equally separate and distinct, built by the plaintiff for his own occupation, and for carrying on his own business, and constructed so that those objects might be conveniently performed by him. To that end he built on the ground floor of No. 48 a staircase communicating with the first floor of No. 48, and he partitioned off the first floor of No. 48, so that it became in its turn just as distinct a building, just as distinct a tenement, as Nos. 49 and 50, and the purpose was equally distinct. Then the part coloured blue being still available, and the plaintiff being willing to let it, he constructed a staircase which led from the street, past the first floor of No. 48, and landed upon the blue part, as I will call it, for that is a sufficient description: no communication whatever in fact being made, or, according to the evidence, ever intended to be made, between the part coloured brown and the part coloured blue.

That was the state of things when these parties met to negotiate. The partition which effectually severed the lower part of No. 48 from the upper part of No. 48, coloured blue, had been completely settled and arranged. The defendant upon his first visit looked over all that was then to let, ascertained what the plaintiff meant to let, saw the first floor over No. 48, and said that it would make a very handsome ware-room, but knew at the same time that it was not to be let, because, to use his own expression in his own evidence, the plaintiff told him: "We mean to use that for ourselves." That is the evidence which the defendant has given on this occasion. He says that he was satisfied to some extent with what he looked at, and he desired to acquire it; but he said that he must have a packing-room. He could not mean the first floor of No. 48. Still he insists more than once on the necessity of having a packing-room. I am mentioning these facts in order to ascertain, as it is my duty to do, what I must take to be proved to have been the intention of the parties when they entered into the negotiation. He hunts about for a packing-room; the brother goes with him down into a cellar under No. 48, in the basement of No. 48; they looked about there, and the brother comes in and says, You cannot have it. No wonder, because there can be no

A access to it but from the floor of No. 48, that coloured brown; and that negotiation accordingly went off.

It would be impossible for me to connect—and there was a very faint attempt made to connect—the necessity which was present in the defendant's mind to have a packing-room with the magnificent first floor which he now says he had in his mind when he was present. The statement about putting up the inscription by
B no means encourages any such notion. The defendant desired to advertise to the public, by means of a large inscription on the front of that which was to be his, the trade which he was carrying on. He wished also to have a similar inscription over No. 48, and that was resisted. It was the subject of discussion between them, and the reason that it was resisted was explained to him to be this, because, said the plaintiff, “if we granted you that, it would look as if you were carrying on
C your business in our warehouse.” But, in order to accommodate him, an offer was made to him that he might insert a tablet (providing it did not interfere with the architectural decorations of No. 48) containing his name and business. These facts are beyond all question; both parties are agreed. Then the plaintiff writes a letter in which he speaks of the floor above No. 48, among other things. This is answered very readily by the defendant, who accepts the offer. Instructions are
D sent to the solicitors, instructions consisting only of this letter. Counsel for the defendant made a point that the plaintiff in his pleadings said that they had no other instructions. They must have had some other instructions. I should read the word “other,” used by him in the pleadings, as meaning no different instructions, no variation in form or otherwise from the words that appear in the letter.

Under the circumstances, the facts being as I have stated, am I, because
E the lease has been executed under seal demising to the defendant that which the plaintiff never meant to let to him—that which the defendant says he knew the plaintiff intended to keep for himself, that which he has never claimed at any period—am I to say that this agreement is to be held irrevocable? It would be against every principle that regulates the law relating to mistakes, and it would be directly at variance with the proved facts in this case. So far, therefore, as it
F may be said to be a common mistake—and it looks very like a common mistake, if it was true, as the defendant says in his defence, that he took it on the faith that the first floor of No. 48 was intentionally included in the letter of Nov. 13, 1883. Certainly he never said so until it is so stated in the defence which I am looking at now; and he has never said in his evidence that he intended to take that floor—the argument addressed to me has been this: The separation of No. 48
G brown and No. 48 blue is effected solely by means of a brick-on-end partition, and that is easily removed. People building brick-on-end partitions do not mean them to be easily removed, unless there is some purpose to remove them; and here, using the defendant's own evidence on this occasion, at that time the partition was effectually finished, and the defendant knew that the plaintiff intended to reserve it for his own use in his own business.

H The law being such as I have said, it is not necessary to say anything about how easily you can make holes in a partition, and how you can knock down a partition. You can pull down the front of a house with equal ease, if you have proper appliances and proper workmen to do it. What forces itself upon my attention is the reason why the partition was first made, why it was found to be in existence when the defendant first inspected it? Why, he knew from that time, as well as he
I knows now, that it never was the intention of the plaintiff that he should have that magnificent room, which formed one or two rooms which constituted the business place intended by the plaintiff for his own use, and to which the access was made by one staircase communicating with nothing but the upper room. But without being certain, as I cannot be certain on the facts before me, whether the mistake was what is called a common mistake—such a one as would induce the court to strike out of a marriage settlement a particular provision or limitation—whether it was that kind of common mistake or not, that there was to some extent a common mistake, I must, in charity and justice to the defendant, believe;

because I cannot impute to him the intention of taking advantage of any incorrect expression in this letter. He may have persuaded himself that the first floor of No. 48 was intended to be let to him, with all which I have nothing to do; but, whether there was a common mistake or not, it was plain and palpable that the defendant was mistaken, and that the plaintiff had no intention of letting his own shop, that which he had built and carefully constructed for his own means and ends. It is quite clear that he was mistaken.

Upon that ground, therefore, upon unquestioned testimony, I must say that the contract ought to be annulled. I think it would be right and just, and perfectly consistent with other decisions, that the defendant should have an opportunity of choosing whether he would submit (as the plaintiff asks that he should) to have the lease rectified by excluding from it the first floor of No. 48, whether he will choose to take his lease with that rectification, or whether he will choose to throw up the thing entirely, because the object of the court is, as far as it can, to put the parties into the position in which they would have been if the mistake had not happened. Therefore, I give the defendant an opportunity of saying whether he will or will not submit to rectification. If he does not, then I shall declare that the agreement is annulled. [The defendant having elected rectification, His LORDSHIP concluded] The decree will therefore be that the lease be rectified by omitting from it all mention of the first floor of No. 48, coloured brown on the model. The decree will be without costs.

Solicitor—Lien—Extent of lien—Title deeds in possession prior to mortgage—Solicitor acting for both parties—Costs due from mortgagor—Sale of equity of redemption—Solicitor holding deeds for mortgagee.

Before a mortgage the title deeds of the property had been deposited for safe custody with his solicitors by the mortgagor who instructed his solicitors to prepare the mortgage, and the same solicitors acted for both mortgagor and mortgagee in the transaction. The mortgagor paid his solicitors the costs of the mortgage, but certain other costs remained due. The mortgagor filed his petition in bankruptcy, and the trustee sold the equity of redemption and applied to the solicitors for the title deeds, but they claimed a lien on them for their costs due from the mortgagor.

Held: on completion of the mortgage the solicitors held the title deeds for the mortgagee, and they could not set up a lien on the deeds for their costs due from the mortgagor.

Appeal from Liverpool County Court raising the question of a solicitor's lien on title deeds for costs.

C

Prior to 1881, John Nicholson, of Liverpool, builder, purchased certain houses, and deposited the title deeds with his solicitors, Messrs. Quinn & Sons, for safe custody. Being in need of money, on Mar. 4, 1881, he executed a mortgage of his houses to Gilbertson. The costs of and incidental to this mortgage were duly paid to Messrs. Quinn & Sons by the mortgagor. The solicitors continued to hold the title deeds of the mortgaged property. J. Nicholson subsequently presented a petition for bankruptcy, and Henry Bolland was appointed trustee. At this time there were certain costs, amounting to £14 19s. 2d., due from the mortgagor to his solicitors, some of which had been incurred prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition, and some afterwards. The trustee sold the mortgagor's interest in the property, which was the equity of redemption, for £331 15s. 7d., and called for the title deeds from Messrs. Quinn & Sons. They claimed a lien upon the deeds for their costs, and refused to give them up until such costs were satisfied. On Nov. 2, 1883, the county court judge made an order declaring that the solicitors were not entitled to the lien which they claimed, and that the proceeds of sale of the equity of redemption belonged to the trustee. The solicitors, Messrs. Quinn & Sons, appealed.

Mulholland for the solicitors.

F. O. Crump for the trustee in bankruptcy.

BACON, C.J.—When the facts in this case are considered, it is clear that there is no such lien as is claimed. A solicitor's right to lien on deeds depends upon possession. There was a time no doubt when the deeds were in the possession of Nicholson by his solicitors. Nicholson was desirous of borrowing a sum of money upon mortgage, and the same firm of solicitors acted for both mortgagor and mortgagee in the transaction. Their duties, however, in that transaction were of a totally different character. It was their duty to the mortgagee to deduce a good title to the property mortgaged, and to prove it by the production of the deeds as evidence of the title. When the mortgage money was paid, it was no less their duty to hand over the deeds to the mortgagee. At any time indeed after the completion of the mortgage, the mortgagee could have compelled them to hand over to him those deeds, and the existence of that right is totally inconsistent with any lien for the costs which the solicitors now claim against the trustee of the mortgagor. The mortgage was in an absolute form, and the property therein comprised becomes the property of the mortgagee, subject to the mortgagor's equity of redemption. The title deeds of the property became the property of the mortgagee, and no man can have a lien over the property of another for which that person has not contracted. The accident of the deeds having been permitted to remain in the hands of the solicitors cannot alter the rights of the parties; the deeds must belong to the mortgagee. It appears that the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor has sold the property subject to the mortgage. If the purchaser desires to pay off the mortgage, he must go to the mortgagee and say, "There is my money, give me the deeds." The mortgagee could have no answer to give to that demand. He can make no title without the deeds; they are his, and have always been his. When once the facts of this case are clearly stated, there can be no question but that the mortgagee is the person to whom belongs the property in these deeds. In my opinion, the lien which is claimed cannot be substantiated.

By a marriage settlement, made in 1832, real estate was settled to the use of husband and wife for their lives and after their deaths and in default of issue to the use of such persons as the wife should by will appoint. The real estate was sold by the trustees and the proceeds invested in consols under a power of sale in the settlement and a direction to lay out the proceeds in other lands and until so laid out to invest the proceeds in government securities. Subsequently the consols were transferred into the name of the wife and she made a will giving the residue of her personal estate to two persons absolutely. At her death the consols remained in her name.

Held: the gift of residue was made under s. 27 of the Wills Act, 1837; on the construction of that section put on it by s. 1 of the Act it was personal estate and operated as a valid execution of the general power of appointment of realty under the settlement; and, accordingly, the consols passed under the gift.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., holding that a gift by the testator of all the residue of her personal property operated as a valid exercise of a general power of appointment by will over land sold under a power in her marriage settlement and the proceeds invested in consols and since transferred into the name of the testatrix and that the consols passed under the will.

By a settlement made in 1832 on the marriage of John Brown with Ann Lee, Edward Lee, her father, settled real estate, after the deaths of the husband and wife and failure of their issue, to such uses as Ann Lee should by will appoint, with remainder to the use of Edward Lee in fee. The settlement contained a power for the trustees to sell the real estate, with a direction that the trustees should lay out the proceeds of the sale in the purchase of other hereditaments to be settled to the like uses, and directed that, until so laid out, the proceeds should be invested in government or other securities, the income to be paid to the person or persons to whom the rents of the hereditaments to be purchased would be payable in case such purchase were then actually made. Edward Lee died in 1843, having by his will devised all his real estate to his nephew, Edward Lee Baldwin. John Brown died in 1853, and there was no issue of the marriage. In 1855 the trustees of the settlement sold all the settled real estates, and the moneys arising therefrom were invested in the purchase of £24,266 consols, which in 1875 were transferred into the name of Ann Brown. About the same time Ann Brown made her will, whereby, after appointing the defendants her executors and bequeathing legacies to the amount of upwards of £30,000, she gave and bequeathed all the residue of her personal estate and effects whatsoever to two persons absolutely. Ann Brown died in 1879, and her personal estate, exclusive of the sum of consols, was under £6,000. The plaintiff, who derived title under Edward Lee Baldwin, claimed to be entitled to the consols on the ground that they passed as real estate under the limitation in the settlement in default of appointment by Ann Brown. The defendants, by their defence, submitted that the will of Ann Brown operated as a valid execution of the power of appointment. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., held that the will did operate as a valid appointment of the consols. The plaintiff appealed.

JAMES, L.J.—In this case I am of opinion that the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., ought to be affirmed. The testatrix had a power over the fund in question under the will; that is to say, it was treated as being liable to be invested in land, and she had power to appoint it. Therefore she had power to dispose of a thing by an instrument properly executed. What she did was this: Almost immediately before the execution of her will, there being this fund outstanding in the hands of trustees, the property being liable to be invested in land, she applied to have the fund transferred to her. I cannot attribute any object to her in asking for that transfer, or any object to the trustee in making the transfer to her, but an intention to reduce it into possession—to make it her own personal estate—which it would be, subject to any equity which might be afterwards enforced against her executors in case she died intestate; but she intended it to be her personal estate. She had made it her personal estate so far as she could. Then, by her will, she gave the whole of her personal estate, subject to any equity, to certain persons, subject to certain legacies and other purposes mentioned in her will. A

The question then is: Was that gift by her liable to be defeated by a person who says: "You have not exercised the power of appointment over it, because it was real estate?" It was real estate, in the hands of the trustees. It was not liable to be recalled and made real estate by any person who had an equity paramount to her equity, who claimed under her will. But we must see whether she has done sufficient to destroy that equity, that is, the equity which could be enforced against her as a wrongdoer, treating her as having acted tortiously—whether she was a wrongdoer or not—and then they might say "You have got our estate, and you must give it back to us." So the question is raised. She gave all her personal estate—this was her personal estate—under a power in s. 27 of Wills Act, 1837, which says that a bequest of personal estate of a testatrix shall be deemed to include any personal estate which she had power to appoint in any manner she pleased. Beyond all question or doubt, this was personal estate. It was existing as personal estate de facto. Whether it is treated as personal estate liable to be invested in land or not, the testatrix in this case had power to appoint it generally in any manner she thought fit. She does give it. It seems to me to be impossible to cut down the words of the will so as to prevent the will having any operation over that which she made her personal estate so far as she could. She intended to give it, and did give it, as part of her personal estate, as far as she had power to do so, in any character she had power to deal with it, whether it was real or personal estate. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., is right. B C D

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. First, I think it better to dispose of an argument which was pressed upon us by counsel for the plaintiff to some extent, that the testatrix was a trustee of this fund. I often object to a name being used inappropriately, and an argument being founded upon an inappropriate and an improper use of a particular word. She was not a trustee. She took the money out in the name of a trustee, having it afterwards transferred into her own name in pursuance of an express intention, as far as she could, to make it her own and not to hold it as a trustee. It is true that there was a trust attaching to this money, and that yet she was liable to be called upon to re-transfer it to the trustee; and even if that was not done unless she disposed of the property, those entitled under the settlement might make claim against her to make good the amount out of her estate. She was not trustee of it and was not holding it as trustee, but she held it, as far as she could, as her own, subject to the rights in equity which those under the settlement might have. Therefore, it is impossible to say that this can pass under the devise of trust estate contained in her will. It is simply a question, therefore, whether it passes under the previous part of her will. E F G

This is not a contest between two persons taking under her will as to which devise or bequest most aptly described the matter in contest, but is a question whether there has or has not, having regard to the statute, been an exercise of the power under the one and the only one clause of the will which can have that operation. When I look at the words of s. 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, alone, I find it impossible to say that there has not been an exercise of the power as regards this fund, for it is personal estate; that is to say, it is property which, but for the will, passes to the executors, not to her executors, but property which would pass by law and devolve upon the executors of an administrator. H I

Then, though there was a trust which rendered it liable to be laid out again in land, and it would, therefore, to some extent in equity be impressed with the character of land, it is personal estate within the words of s. 27 and the construction put upon it by s. 1 of the Wills Act, 1837. When one comes to treat it as a question of construction and intention on the testatrix's part, we find she had done all that she could do to make this her personal estate, and to take it out of the settle-

A ment; and, having regard to the facts of the case and to the expression of opinion on her part independently of what there is in the will, I agree with SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., that we can see sufficient here to justify us, if it is a question of construction, in construing the words of her will as applying to the fund which she dealt with in the manner she did. She has not done it effectually; because, if she had effectually withdrawn it from the settlement, and the trusts of it, it would have become absolutely personal estate, but it is only for the purpose of enabling us to construe the words of her will and to see what she meant by personal estate.

B It is not necessary to go through the cases which have been quoted. Two of them were cases where there was a contest between different appointors; but I must refer to Gillies v. Longlands (1) decided by KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., because he, in my opinion, expressly decided that case on the ground that there had been nothing done by the lady to show her wish or desire, as far as she could, that there should be a reinvestment in land. He deals first with the question whether the wife could do it so effectually, and answers the question in the negative, and then he says (4 De G. & Sm. at p. 379):

D "But, independently of this consideration, I can find no such act of the widow as shows that she intended to change the character of the fund; and we know that it is not the actual state of the fund, but the state in which it ought to be, that governs the case. Therefore this fund remained as it was immediately after the purchase of 1789."

E He assumes that she had no power effectually to put an end to the trust for investment in land, but he still considers whether there was anything on her part to show an intention to treat it, not as realty, but as personalty. In this case, in my opinion, we have what shows her intention, though I agree it is not a power absolutely to do it. Therefore the decision of KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., in Gillies v. Longlands (1) cannot in my opinion, be considered as in any way an expression of opinion opposed to our judgment in this case, the facts and the circumstances of this case being different on a very material point.

F LUSH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

G JAMES, L.J.—COTTON, L.J., has drawn attention to the fallacy of using the word "trustee." There is another fallacy. The will pointed it out as if this had been real estate. It is only that the heir-at-law would be entitled to it as if it were real estate, but it is quite a fallacy to say that it is real estate, because the gentleman who succeeds to it will take it as personal estate. It is not real estate. It is only quasi real estate. It is to be dealt with by the person who claims as if it had been real estate, and that is what s. 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, says.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Service out of jurisdiction—Defendant's application to discharge order —Affidavits contesting that cause of action within jurisdiction—Admissibility.

In an action against the defendant, who resided in Scotland, to recover money paid by the plaintiff as a result of misrepresentations which, it was alleged, had been made by the defendant and others concerning a colliery in Wales, the plaintiff obtained leave to serve the defendant in Scotland on an application supported by an affidavit stating that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction. Upon service of the writ the defendant entered a conditional appearance, and made an application to discharge the order for service supported by an affidavit contradicting the plaintiff's affidavit, whereupon the plaintiff filed an affidavit in reply. On appeal by the defendant against refusal of the application to discharge the order for service and disallowance of the affidavits as inadmissible,

Held: on a motion to discharge an order for service out of the jurisdiction affidavits to contest the question whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction were admissible.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of CHITTY, J., refusing the defendant's application to discharge an order giving the plaintiff leave to serve the writ in the action on the defendant in Edinburgh and disallowing the defendant's affidavit and the plaintiff's affidavit to be read.

The action was brought against the defendant Charles Murray Barstow, who resided in Edinburgh, to recover £3,000, which was paid in 1875 by the plaintiff, in consequence, as of alleged false representations, which were made to him by the defendant and some others with regard to the Rhydygalad Colliery, near Mold, in the county of Flint.

On Oct. 6, 1881, the plaintiff obtained an order for leave to serve the writ in the action on the defendant at Edinburgh. This order was obtained upon an affidavit by the plaintiff which purported to show that in November, 1875, he was induced by the defendant and two others to take a substantial interest in the colliery, and after negotiation paid the defendant and the two others £1.125 for a fifth share in the colliery, and that he was induced to acquire such interest upon certain representations of those persons; that the whole of the negotiations which resulted in his paying the sum took place in the city of London; that he had since

A discovered that the representations so made to him were wholly untrue, that he had recently commenced an action for damages in respect of the misrepresentations complained of against two of the parties who lived in London, that he was now desirous of bringing a similar action against the defendant who resided in Edinburgh, and that it was very desirable to have the proposed action against the defendant tried in this court, especially having regard to the probability of its being tried

B together with the action against the parties living in London.

The writ having been served on the defendant he entered a conditional appearance and then applied to CHITTY, J., to discharge the order for service, and to set aside the service. In support of his application he filed an affidavit in which he swore that he never received any of the plaintiff's money and never had any negotiations with the plaintiff whatsoever; that he was not in London at the end of 1875, and never saw the plaintiff until February, 1876, when he saw him at Mold in Wales.

C On Nov. 7, 1881, the plaintiff filed another affidavit in reply. CHITTY, J., did not allow the defendant's affidavit or the plaintiff's affidavit to be used, and he refused the application. The defendant appealed.

Crossley, Q.C., and Birrell, for the defendant.

Grosvenor Woods for the plaintiff.

D SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This case has now been much more fully discussed than it was possible for it to be discussed upon a motion day before CHITTY, J., and I am not sure that this court, in reversing the decision, will be really deciding adversely to what CHITTY, J., would have done if the question had been fully considered by him.

E In the first place, it is very important to ascertain what the present practice is under the Judicature Acts and rules, with respect to service out of the jurisdiction. By the preface to the rules, where there is no rule upon any point, the former practice is to prevail. It sometimes happened that the practice in equity differed from that at common law, and the Appeal Court decided generally that that which was the better practice should prevail, but of course it is only the Appeal Court

F that can say which is the better practice upon any particular point [but see now s. 36 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provides for the concurrent administration of law and equity: 18 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 474]. But where the old practice was the same in chancery and at common law, it still remained in force if no other provision was made by the rules.

G Under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which was rather stricter in its terms as to service out of the jurisdiction than the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, it was the practice to allow a defendant who had been served out of the jurisdiction to file an affidavit to show that the plaintiff had no cause of action arising within the jurisdiction. And if, upon reading the affidavit, there was any doubt upon the matter, the court put the plaintiff upon an undertaking to have his action dismissed with costs, if it should turn out that there really was no

H cause of action within the jurisdiction. In equity the practice was equally well settled; the rules, however, were rather more lax than they are under the Act of 1873. The bill was ordered to be served, and the defendant put in his conditional appearance and was then allowed to file affidavits denying that there was any cause of action within the jurisdiction. The very point was decided by LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Foley v. Maillardet (1) and that settled the practice. That

I being so, it is clear that the practice as to the admissibility of affidavits to contest the question whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction was the same in the common law courts and in chancery, and that is still the practice. Therefore affidavits are admissible for this purpose. I do not say to try the merits of the case, but only to try the forum.

No doubt, then, these affidavits ought to have been admitted. This is an action for deceit, and the allegation is that certain false representations were made by the defendant within the jurisdiction. It comes within the third branch of R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 11, r. 1. But it was suggested that such an affidavit as is required by r. 1a, which is limited to cases where the defendant is resident in Scotland or Ireland, might be required in such an action as this. But r. 1a is carefully confined to that portion of r. 1 which relates to actions of contract. LUSH, L.J., and I were members of the committee which framed the rule, and we know therefore that that was the intention. It is also clearly expressed. A

Another ground taken by the defendant is, that r. 3 requires the plaintiff's affidavit to show whether the defendant is a British subject or not, and that that is not stated here. But the rule does not say that the order shall be discharged for an omission of what is not required. If what is omitted is wholly immaterial, there is no obligation on the court to discharge the rule. The object is this: If you serve a British subject with a writ you may serve him anywhere; but if the person to be served is out of the jurisdiction, and is not a British subject, he is only to be served with notice and not with the writ itself. Therefore the court must know whether it is to order the writ or only the notice to be served. But if the defendant is residing in Scotland, it is immaterial to state his nationality, for any one who is residing within the Queen's dominions may be served with the Queen's writ. If he is a foreigner, he owes the Queen a temporary allegiance while he is within her dominions. Though the rule is not so well expressed as it might have been, that is the object of it, and no court would discharge an order for service of a writ out of the jurisdiction in Scotland or Ireland because the affidavit did not state that the defendant was a British subject. [HIS LORDSHIP then referred to the affidavits, upon which he came to the conclusion that it was proved that the plaintiff had not a cause of action arising, within the jurisdiction.] The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the order for service discharged with costs in both courts. B C D E

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I desire to state concisely my reasons for agreeing that this order should be discharged. This is an action for damages for misrepresentation. There is, of course, nothing upon the face of the writ to show the ground for service out of the jurisdiction; and, in order to obtain permission to do so, the plaintiff had to support his application by an affidavit, showing the grounds upon which the application was made, under R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 11, r. 3. That does not mean that the merits of the case are to be fully gone into, but that it must be shown that the misrepresentation took place within the jurisdiction. F

As at present advised, I think that the plaintiff's original affidavit was sufficient to obtain leave, reading it in the ordinary sense in which it is usual to read affidavits. I see now that there was a way of reading it which makes it insufficient. Then the defendant puts in an affidavit which, if true, shows that the plaintiff really had no grounds. I quite agree that an affidavit may be made by the defendant to show that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order; but the affidavit ought not to go beyond that. For that purpose, no doubt, it may be necessary, to some extent, to go into the merits. I think, therefore, that these affidavits ought to have been read; and, reading them all together, it is clear that the defendant's case is established. G H.

LUSH, L.J.—I am very glad to find that the practice is established in the Chancery Division as it has been in the common law division, where it has been the practice since the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and indeed ever since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, to admit the defendant's affidavits. The difference between the practice under the Common Law Procedure Act and that under the Judicature Act is that under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 18, the plaintiff issued his writ at his peril. He had to give notice of the writ in a foreign country, for it would be an affront to serve a writ upon a foreigner in his own country; but a British subject might be served anywhere. Then the question always arose whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction, and it was open to the defendant to go into evidence upon that point. The Judicature Act, however, requires leave to be obtained before the writ is issued, which, I think, is an improvement. What the court has to ascertain, before giving leave, I

A is whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction or not. But in the first instance the order is necessarily made ex parte, leaving it to the defendant to apply afterwards to discharge it. Then, as the court has to ascertain the true fact, it is necessary to go into evidence. Then, what is the state of things here? The plaintiff's affidavit made a good prima facie case. It is, in my opinion, sufficiently specific. But the defendant comes and says the affidavit is utterly untrue; and the plaintiff, in his affidavit in reply, does not deny a single material statement of the defendant. I have no doubt, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

PLATING CO. v. FARQUHARSON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., James and Cotton, L.JJ.), March 23, 1881]

[Reported 17 Ch.D. 49; 50 L.J.Ch. 406; 44 L.T. 389; 45 J.P. 568; 29 W.R. 510]

Contempt of Court—Advertisements inviting subscriptions towards costs of action—Reward offered for documentary evidence—Common interest in subject of litigation.

Contempt of Court—Attachment—Object of motion merely apology and costs—Undesirability.

An injunction had been granted to restrain the infringement of a patent and an appeal was pending. After notice of the appeal had been given, a newspaper published advertisements referring to the action and the appeal and inviting subscriptions from members of the trade towards the cost of the appeal and a reward of £100 for producing documentary evidence. On a motion to commit the publisher and printer of the newspaper for contempt of court, Held: to justify an order for committal it must be shown that the advertisements on their face conveyed to the mind of a person of ordinary intelligence that they would tend to interfere with the administration of justice; where there was a common interest in a subject-matter under litigation those concerned might combine together to defend it and advertise for subscriptions to prosecute the litigation; accordingly, the advertisements having been inserted merely in the ordinary course of business, there was no ground to impeach their propriety.

Per COTTON, L.J.: Motions to commit where there is no real intention to ask for an order for committal, but only to obtain an apology and costs, are to be discouraged.

- (1) Pool v. Sacheverel (1720), 1 P.Wms. 675; 24 E.R. 565, L.C.; 16 Digest (Repl.) 34, 282.

Motion by the plaintiffs to commit the printers and publishers of the "Birmingham Daily Post" for contempt of court, on the ground that they had, since notice of appeal was given, published in that newspaper certain advertisements having reference to the action and the appeal, which would tend to prejudice the plaintiffs in the prosecution of the action and the appeal.

An action was brought to restrain an alleged infringement by the defendants of the plaintiffs' patent, known as Adam's patent for nickel plating by electricity, or electroplating articles made of copper or other baser metal. The defendants disputed the validity of the patent. On Feb. 17, 1881, BACon, V.-C., decided all the issues in favour of the plaintiffs, and granted the injunction asked for. On Feb. 26, 1881, the defendants gave notice of appeal, and the appeal was still pending. The advertisements were published on several days in March, 1881. One of them was headed "Important Notice to Nickel Platers and Manufacturers," and with the title of the action. It proceeded:

"Judgment having been given against the defendants for an alleged infringement of Adams's patent for nickel plating, it is proposed to carry the case into the Court of Appeal, provided the trade will come forward and subscribe the necessary funds for doing so. The defendants have been put to very great expense in defending this action, which has lasted several days, and if the verdict is not reversed it will deter any firm from practising the art of nickel plating by any process whatever, except the plaintiffs and their licensees."

The advertisement went on to state that the matter was of urgent and vital importance to all nickel platers, and earnestly solicited subscriptions, which would be received by the defendant's solicitor, whose name was given. The other advertisement complained of appeared among the "miscellaneous advertisements," and was as follows:

"Nickel Plating.—£100 reward to anyone who can produce documentary evidence that nickel plating was done previous to 1869.—Address P., 'Daily Post'."

In the same papers in which these advertisements appeared, and in the same column with the first of them, appeared an advertisement of the plaintiffs, headed "Caution to Electro-Nickel Platers and Dealers in Electro-Nickel Plated articles." It proceeded to state that the Chancery Division of the High Court had, in the judgment in the action, "fully established" the exclusive right of the plaintiffs under their patent, and it gave notice that the plaintiffs would take legal proceedings against infringers of their patent rights, but that they would be prepared to entertain applications for licences from persons desirous of using the invention.

Aston, Q.C., and Seward Brice for the plaintiffs.

Davey, Q.C., and Phipson Beale for the printers and publishers of the "Birmingham Daily Post."

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This is an application against the printer of a newspaper to commit him for contempt of court, for inserting two advertisements. The printer received the advertisements in the ordinary course of his business, with no more intention of interfering with the course of justice than the boy who carried out the newspapers. In order to commit the printer for contempt, you must show that on the face of the advertisements themselves, they conveyed to his mind such information that a person of ordinary intelligence conducting a newspaper must

A have known that they would tend to interfere with the administration of justice. Not only is nothing of the kind shown, but as far as I can see, there is no ground whatever for impeaching the propriety of the advertisements.

The first advertisement complained of follows an advertisement by the plaintiffs in the action, to the effect that the defendants had infringed their patent, which is called "Adam's Patent for Nickel-Plating," and that there has been a recent judgment which fully established their exclusive right. Whether that is quite accurate or not it is not now necessary to consider, because the motion is not against the plaintiffs for inserting that advertisement, but by the plaintiffs against somebody else; and I only remark upon it for the purpose of saying that the plaintiffs do not appear to have been very careful themselves as to stating exactly what the true state of matters was, because this advertisement was inserted after notice of appeal had been given, and therefore perhaps it is not quite accurate to say that "it is fully established" by the judgment in the Chancery Division.

The defendants advertised to this effect:

"Judgment having been given against the defendants for an alleged infringement, it is proposed to carry the case to the Court of Appeal, provided the trade will come forward and subscribe the necessary funds for so doing."

D They go on to say that they have been put to very great expense, and that if the verdict is not reversed it will deter any firm from practising the art of nickel-plating by any process whatever, except the plaintiffs and their licensees. The first part of that advertisement is a statement of fact; the second is matter of opinion, namely, whether it will deter or not. The advertisement goes on to say this:

E "The matter being of vital importance to all nickel-platers, your subscription is solicited, and the defendants venture to hope that this appeal will meet with a hearty response from all interested."

Then they say:

F "Several influential firms have come forward already and volunteered to pay their share of the expenses, and the defendants hope that their example will be followed by all in the trade."

I am utterly at a loss to know what there is improper in that advertisement. All the trade is interested in freeing the trade from a monopoly of any kind, whether by a patent or otherwise; and we know it is customary for all the traders who are interested in opposing a patent to combine to do so, on the same principle that people claiming a right of common were allowed to combine to assist the defendant who was attempted to be interfered with by the lord on the ground that the right of common did not exist, the doctrine being that when there was a common interest the persons entitled to it might combine to defend it. It is, within my certain knowledge, and has been for many years the common practice in patent cases, that if a patentee attacks one manufacturer the other manufacturers combine together to defend the case, so that the whole expense shall not be thrown on the one that is attacked; otherwise they might be attacked in detail, and, although it might be a bad patent, they might all lose their cases. I may mention, as an instance which has come before me in my court, the well-known combination of millers to defeat Bovill's patent. That being so, I can see nothing wrong in this advertisement, and certainly nothing to inform the printer that it was an interference with the course of justice; and there does not seem to me to be any ground whatever for complaining of it.

The other advertisement is this.

It is said that that would induce people to forge documents. But, in the first place, £100 is not such a very large sum as that it would necessarily have that tendency; and, in the next place, documentary evidence is not very easily forged, and I do not think it very likely that people would come forward for £100 reward who were professed forgers and tender a forged document. I think the whole notion is a wild one, and not grounded on any reasonable conclusion as to the effect of such an advertisement, which, I think, is a very harmless one. It is a very common form of advertisement. It is a constant practice to advertise offering a reward for the discovery of a lost deed or a lost will, or for a certificate of marriage or of baptism to prove heirship or kinship. That is done as a matter of course. Generally, no doubt, the amount of the offer is not quite so large as £100, but sometimes it is; and I never heard it suggested that those advertisements were illegal, or were not a proper mode of obtaining evidence. It seems to me that the whole notion of making motions of this kind against innocent people like the editors or printers of newspapers ought to be discouraged as far as possible. They lead to great waste of time, and to a considerable amount of law costs incurred by some one or other; and, as I said before, unless the court is satisfied that it is a contempt which does interfere with the administration of justice, of course the court ought not to interfere.

I must make one remark before I conclude, on a case that has been cited, of Pool v. Sacheverel (1). I do not profess to understand it as it is reported. In that case there seems to have been an advertisement issued for evidence to disprove a marriage by showing that a marriage certificate, which was alleged to refer to two people of different names which were the names mentioned in the certificate, did not really apply to persons who bore those names. That was treated by LORD PARKER, L.C., as being a direct inducement to subornation of perjury. But there the motion to commit was made against a party to the cause, and not against the editor or printer of a newspaper. On the facts stated in the report of that case I should not myself have come to the same conclusion. Of course if there were an attempt to suborn witnesses it would be a contempt of court, and an undue interference with the course of justice. With great respect, however, to that learned Lord Chancellor, I should not have come to the same conclusion on the same facts. But it does not appear to me that an advertisement for evidence to prove something not in the knowledge of the advertiser, but which he believes to be true, can be treated as subornation of perjury, because that means something done to induce people to come forward to prove that which the person asking him to prove it believes to be false; and on that distinction, it appears to me, the case ought to turn. However, it is not necessary now to say more than that that case does not apply to the case before us; but I do reserve to myself the fullest power of saying that if ever such a point should come before me sitting in the Court of Appeal, I should feel myself at liberty to disregard the conclusions which were come to by the Lord Chancellor in that case.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the motion had been made against the defendant himself, I think it must have failed. Made against the publishers of the newspaper, who only inserted this advertisement in the ordinary course of their business, it seems to me to be simply extravagant, and a thing to be strongly discouraged. In regard to the case which has been referred to, it appears to me inconsistent with the practice of the government of this country to offer rewards for the conviction of offenders.

COTTON, L.J.—I have arrived at the same result, and I need not repeat the reasons for our decision, which have been given by the Master of the Rolls; but I should like to add one word, namely, that I entirely disapprove of motions to commit where there is no real intention of asking the court to commit the party against whom the motion is made. Where counsel, in opening the case, says, "I do not ask for committal; all that I ask for is an apology and payment of costs."—when a motion is made in that sense—in my opinion it is a mere waste of the time of the court. My own view will be in future to give a person making such a motion, where there is no case for committal, no costs of his motion. I mention this now, so that the Court of Appeal may not in future be troubled with motions

A where there is really no case for committing the person against whom the motion is made.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—I think I ought to express my entire concurrence in what COTTON, L.J. has said about motions to commit.

B JAMES, L.J.—I certainly would not only not give them their costs, but I should feel inclined to make them pay costs in such cases. I think these motions are a contempt of court in themselves, because they tend to waste the public time in the most reckless manner.

Motion refused.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), on a demurrer in an action brought by the plaintiff to enforce an obligation created in his favour against the defendants by a judgment of the District Court of Tiflis, Russia. C

Paragraph 1 of the statement of claim in the action alleged that on Mar. 9, 1877, in a suit between the plaintiff and the defendants in the action in the District Court of Tiflis, in Russia, it was ordered by the judgment of the court that the defendants should return to the plaintiff certain goods of the plaintiff, or in default that the plaintiff should recover their value amounting to a sum specified, and a fixed sum for costs, which sums the defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiff, and that the judgment was still in force and unsatisfied. Paragraph 2 alleged that the defendants appealed against the judgment to the High Court of Tiflis, and the High Court affirmed the judgment of the District Court. In para. 14 of the defence the defendants pleaded that, if the judgments, or either of them, were obtained as alleged, each of them was obtained by the gross fraud of the plaintiff and of her husband, Gregor Melceovitch Abouloff, acting in collusion with her in fraudulently concealing from the District Court and the High Court that the whole of the goods were, as the fact was and as the plaintiff and her husband well knew, at the time the suit was commenced and during the whole time it was depending, and at the time of the alleged judgment, in the actual possession of the plaintiff and concealed by the plaintiff and her husband, except as to so much of the goods as the plaintiff and her said husband had from time to time secretly and fraudulently disposed of. The plaintiff demurred to para. 14 of the defence on the ground that the facts therein alleged could and ought to have been pleaded to the suit in the said District Court of Tiflis and High Court of Tiflis, and on other grounds. The Divisional Court held that the paragraph demurred to disclosed a good defence to the action, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed. D E F G

Woolf and Abrahams for the plaintiff.

Benjamin, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C. (Horne Payne with them), for the defendants.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we have to decide on a demurrer to para. 14 of the defence, which is pleaded in these circumstances: The plaintiff alleges that she sued the defendants in the District Court of Tiflis, and obtained judgment for the return of certain goods or their value, and that this judgment was affirmed on appeal by the High Court of Tiflis, and is still in force and unsatisfied; an action is brought on this judgment in the High Court of Justice in this country, and to this action the defendants plead that, if it is true the action was brought and judgment recovered in the court of Tiflis, such judgment was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff in deceiving the court at Tiflis by false and fraudulent representations. It is said that this action is an attempt to enforce in the High Court in this country a judgment which was obtained in the Russian court by the fraud of the same person who now seeks to obtain the benefit of such judgment. H I

In support of the demurrer it is argued that the defence pleaded is bad because the allegation of fraud must have been before the court at Tiflis, and the court

A must have decided that the existence of the fraud alleged was not established by the evidence. It is said that the fact was within the jurisdiction of the courts at Tiflis to examine, and they did examine as to it, or might have examined, and whether they came to the right conclusion or not cannot be tried here. That contention amounts to this, that it is to be taken on the pleadings that the courts in Russia were misled by the false statement of the plaintiff, and the defendants are
 B not at liberty to say so here by way of defence to the present action. This certainly appears to be a monstrous result.

Many authorities have been cited in the course of the argument, and they are in some respects conflicting, but I am unable to perceive in any of the cases, from the Duchess of Kingston's Case (1) down to the present time, anything which can have the effect of compelling us to decide that, where a judgment has been obtained
 C in a foreign court by fraud, this fact cannot be set up in an English court as a defence to an action on the foreign judgment brought by the person by whose own fraud that judgment was procured. As a matter of justice it is obvious that such a defence ought to be available, and if it were not so we should be compelled to fly in the face of the rule that no man can take advantage of his own wrong, and lay down as law that he could.

D It is not necessary to inquire at present as to what is the accurate mode of stating the way of enforcing foreign judgments in the courts of this country. The law as to this question has been elaborately discussed by PARKE, B., in Williams v. Jones (2) and by BLACKBURN, J., in Godard v. Gray (3) and Schibsby v. Westenholtz (4); but for the purpose of the present case I think it is enough to say that the courts in this country will enforce obligations created by foreign judgments, and it
 E is an answer to an action brought to enforce such an obligation to say that the judgment in the foreign court has been obtained by the fraud of the person who is seeking to enforce it here.

In the Duchess of Kingston's Case (1) the law is thus stated by DE GREY, C.J., in answer to the questions put by the House of Lords

F "But if it was a direct and decisive sentence upon the point, and, as it stands, to be admitted as conclusive evidence upon the court, and not to be impeached from within; yet, like all other acts of the highest judicial authority, it is impeachable from without; although it is not permitted to show that the court was mistaken, it may be shown that they were misled. Fraud is an extrinsic collateral act, which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice. LORD COKE says it avoids all judicial acts, ecclesiastical or temporal."

G I do not know that the difference which exists has ever been more tersely or neatly stated than in this passage. The question is, whether the court which gave the foreign judgment has been misled intentionally by fraud which was intended to procure the judgment, and which has had influence in procuring the judgment. If it is so, since the Duchess of Kingston's Case (1) it can be pleaded. The principle has been stated over and over again; it has been stated by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in
 H Bank of Australasia v. Nias (5) and by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Ochsenbein v. Papelier (6), who cites the authorities and treats it as clear, and says (8 Ch. App. at p. 698):

I "I should be sorry to think that anything should fall from this court which might give the least colour to any doubt as to the power of a court of law to take cognisance of fraud in obtaining foreign judgments."

and again (ibid. at p. 700):

"The words used by BLACKBURN, J., in Godard v. Gray (3) were not intended to throw any doubt upon so clear a matter."

These authorities show that it is a clear proposition of law that an obligation arising on a foreign judgment may be answered on the ground that the foreign court has been misled by the fraud of the person seeking to enforce the obligation arising from the judgment.

There was an ingenious attempt made to distinguish the present case by accepting the proposition which I have stated, and attempting to bring the case within another proposition which is equally clear; namely, that the courts in this country will not examine a foreign judgment, and the Russian court must have decided the question raised by this defence and come to the conclusion that there was no fraud. I think the answer to this contention was given by counsel for the defendants, that the question whether the court was misled cannot have been submitted to the court, or have been at issue on the trial, and therefore can never have been decided, and consequently that the English courts are not discussing any question which has been submitted to the foreign courts. A B

Then it is suggested there is a limitation to the doctrine as to setting up the defence of fraud, which is that, if it were possible the same question could have been submitted to the court which gave the judgment, it cannot afterwards be raised. I do not think that the breadth of the general proposition is subject to such a limitation as this. I think that fraud is capable of being pleaded in answer to an action on the judgment, although all the facts might have been proved in the foreign court, but by fraud and perjury misleading the foreign court a judgment is obtained, where it is a fraud practised in order to obtain the judgment, and by which the judgment has been obtained. C D

I think, therefore, on all grounds—on the ground that no man can take advantage of his own wrong, and on the ground that it is a principle of law that no action lies on a judgment which has been obtained by the fraud of the person seeking to take advantage of the judgment—that this is a good defence, and the demurrer ought to be overruled. E

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The statement of claim alleges that an action was brought by the present plaintiff in the District Court of Tiflis, and that judgment was given in her favour for delivery of the goods claimed or payment of their value, which judgment was afterwards affirmed on appeal by the High Court at Tiflis. If that judgment were properly obtained the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in an action on the judgment in this country, but in para. 14 of the defence it is alleged that the goods were in the possession of the plaintiff while the suit was pending, and when the judgment was given, and that the plaintiff fraudulently concealed this fact from the court, and represented that the goods were not in her possession, and that the judgment was obtained by means of this fraudulent concealment and representation. This can have no other meaning than that the court was misled by fraud, practised for the purpose of obtaining judgment, and by means of which the judgment was obtained. It was contended by counsel for the plaintiff that, assuming the truth of the facts alleged in the defence, which must be assumed for the purpose of the demurrer, these facts may have been before the court at Tiflis, and so the court may have been mistaken and not misled within the meaning of the opinion of DE GREY, C.J., which has already been referred to. As at present advised, if all the facts had been before the court at Tiflis, and the court had not inferred the existence of fraud, still, if an English court saw that fraud was proved, which had been practised for the purpose of obtaining the judgment, and by means of which the judgment had been obtained, I should be prepared to hold that the judgment could not be enforced. F G H

BRETT, L.J.—I think that on the true construction of the statement of claim it means that the goods have not been returned to the plaintiff, for it alleges that the judgment is still in force and unsatisfied. Then para. 14 of the defence alleges that the judgment was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff in representing to the court that the goods were not in the plaintiff's possession, when in fact they were. It seems to me that this is an allegation that the plaintiff for the purpose of deceiving the court committed a fraudulent and wicked deception on the court, and was successful in obtaining judgment by means of that deception. I

- A The action before us is solely an English action, brought in an English court, and to be decided according to English law. The obligation is recognised by English law, and judgment can be recovered in England. Here the obligation is imposed by the judgment of a foreign court, but I think the proposition would be the same if the original action had been brought in any court where an action could be brought on the judgment, and that the same doctrine would have been applicable.
- B The whole doctrine as to enforcing the obligation imposed by a foreign judgment is an English doctrine. I am prepared to say that the proposition already referred to, which was stated by DE GREY, C.J., and adopted by the House of Lords in the Duchess of Kingston's Case (1), contains a correct statement of the law on the subject, and I think that, if a judgment is procured by means of fraud, which fraud has been committed in order to procure the judgment, and
- C has procured it, an action on that judgment cannot be successful. I think this is an absolute proposition, and is founded, as the Lord Chief Justice has stated, on the proposition that no man can be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and also on the ground, as counsel for the defendants contended, that no obligation can be enforced in an English court which is obtained by the fraud of the person seeking to enforce such obligation.
- D Another point has been raised, which is this: It is said that it must have been shown in the court in which the judgment was obtained that the facts relied on as showing the plaintiff's fraud existed, and that the defendants must have given evidence in relation to those facts, and that if not this ought to have been negatived in the defence. Whether this last proposition is correct, or whether what the plaintiff seeks to put forward might be replied, is not very important. The real
- E question is, assuming those facts to be true, and to have been before the Russian court, are the defendants prevented from proving and relying on the plaintiff's fraud in an action on the judgment brought in an English court? I think that, even if the defendants gave the same evidence in the previous cause, this does not prevent their giving the same evidence, and relying on the fraud which that evidence proves, in an action in an English court. It is said that this should prevent their
- F giving such evidence, in order to prevent the reiteration of trials of the same issue; but with regard to that I agree with what has already been observed, that, as an issue in the cause, the question whether the court was deceived was not in issue at the trial at Tiflis. Here the issue in the first cause was, whether the defendants were wrongfully detaining the plaintiff's goods, and it would be a question of fact whether the defendants had the goods or not. The only issue in the second action
- G would be whether the judgment given by the Russian court in the first action was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff, and this question may be determined by the same facts as those brought before the Russian court or by other facts, but it is not the same issue as was before that court. The only issue in the second action is as to the fraud of the plaintiff, by which it is alleged the judgment was procured. I think, therefore, that the fraud of the plaintiff, if it procured the
- H judgment, is a good defence; but I am strongly of opinion that the defendants cannot raise the question whether the judgment was erroneous by reason of a wrong appreciation of evidence or of law, or by reason of the fraud of witnesses, which was not the fraud of any of the parties. As to whether the want of jurisdiction can be raised, that question is not now before us.
- I I do not think there is anything to be found in any judgment which militates against our opinion in the present case, except, perhaps, an expression of doubt by JAMES, L.J., in Flower v. Lloyd (7). There, however, he is speaking of the falsehood and fraud alleged in that action, and I think the falsehood and fraud there charged was falsehood and fraud of servants, not of a party to the action, and I think also that it was not falsehood and fraud in a proceeding before the court. If the Lord Justice meant his remarks to extend to fraud of the party in a proceeding before the court, I cannot agree with them; what was said was not a decision binding on this court, but only the expression of a doubt. All the other judges whose decisions have been referred to think fraud is an extrinsic and collateral matter which prevents the obligation that would otherwise arise on a judgment from being enforced. I accept the whole of that doctrine, and am of opinion that para. 14 of the defence in the present case shows a good defence, and the plaintiff's demurrer to it ought to be overruled, and the decision appealed from affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

WEBB v. STENTON AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., Lindley and Fry, L.J.J.), June 7, 8, 1883]

[Reported 11 Q.B.D. 518; 52 L.J.Q.B. 584; 49 L.T. 432]

Execution—Garnishee order—Debt "owing or accruing"—Instalments of income payable by trustees—Sum advanced larger than next payment.

The judgment debtor was entitled under a will to an annual income for life payable by the trustees half-yearly and had assigned his interest by mortgage to secure the repayment of a loan. The trustees had advanced the debtor more than the amount of the next half-yearly payment. A creditor sought to attach the debtor's interest under the will by a garnishee order under R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2, which allowed all "debts owing or accruing" from the garnishee to the debtor to be attached.

Held: to obtain a garnishee order under R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2, the creditor had to show that a debt existed which either was then payable or would become payable at a future time; as there was no debt then due from the trustees there was no "debt owing or accruing" from the trustees to the debtor; and, therefore, the debtor's interest under the will could not be attached.

Further, there was adequate power to protect the interests of the creditor as, if this was a proper case, a receiver could have been appointed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Divisional Court (CAVE and DAY, JJ.) on a Special Case refusing a garnishee order to attach the interest of John Hatton (against whom the plaintiff had obtained a judgment for debt and costs) in the hands of the defendants, the trustees of the will of the Rev. Charles Fletcher.

John Hatton became entitled in August, 1882, under the will of the Rev. Charles Fletcher, deceased, for his life, to one fourth of one fourth share of the income arising from the trust fund under the will. The share of John Hatton amounted in value to the annual sum of £85 or thereabouts, payable half-yearly in the months of February and August. By a mortgage deed dated Oct. 31, 1882, John Hatton assigned his interest under the will to James Roger Allen to secure the repayment of £300, together with interest thereon after at the rate of five per cent. per annum. A payment of £60 had been made to John Hatton on account of his share of income due to him in consequence of the heavy expenses he had been put to by the recent illness and death of his wife. The question for the court was whether the interest to which John Hatton became entitled under the will was attachable under R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2, on Nov. 11, 1882.

Ord. 45, r. 2, provided that the court or a judge might, upon the affidavit of a judgment creditor or his solicitor,

"stating that judgment has been recovered and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what amount, and that any other person is indebted to the judgment debtor and is within the jurisdiction, order that all debts owing or accruing from such third person (hereinafter called the garnishee) to the judgment debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment debt."

By s. 61 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 :

"It shall be lawful for a judge, upon the ex parte application of [a] judgment creditor, either before or after [an] oral examination, and upon affidavit by himself or his attorney stating that judgment has been recovered, and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what amount, and that any other person is indebted to the judgment debtor, and is within the jurisdiction, to order that all debts owing or accruing from such third person (hereinafter called the garnishee) to the judgment debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment debt. . . ."

Cur. adv. vult.

June 8, 1883. SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—In this case a judgment creditor proposed to attach in the hands of the trustees of the judgment debtor moneys which he alleged were accruing debts from the trustees to the judgment debtor. The relation between the trustees and the judgment debtor is this: The judgment debtor was entitled as cestui que trust to a share of the proceeds of certain property, which, if it came at all into the hands of the trustees, would come in half-yearly. On the facts there is nothing else which could be called a debt. There was no money in the hands of the trustees at the time when the order was applied for; but, if things went on well, there would be some money, which would afterwards come into their hands, and a share of this money would be payable to the judgment debtor. A

The question is whether on this state of facts the judgment creditor can obtain a garnishee order. The Divisional Court refused an order, on the ground that there was no debt owing or accruing at the time when the order was asked for which could be attached under the provisions of R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2. I am of opinion that their decision was right. It seems to me, on the plain meaning of that rule, that no order can be made under it unless some person at the time when the order is so made is indebted to the judgment debtor; if this is so, an order can be made to attach all debts owing or accruing. If there is a debt payable in presenti an order may be made to attach it. If there is a debt that is debitum in presenti, but is payable in the future, that is a debt, and, if that were the only debt in existence, it seems to me that the court could make an order, because the existence of such a debt would satisfy the words, "any other person is indebted to the judgment debtor." There are also the words "owing or accruing," and therefore I think that if there were only an accruing debt that would do, and, although there was no debt payable at the present time, an order might be made. B C D

Here the Special Case shows that there was no debt payable in presenti, and therefore the question is whether there was a debt accruing within the meaning of the words of the rule; if there is such a debt, an order may be made. It therefore becomes our duty to say what in our opinion the meaning of an accruing debt is. E

Can it mean any debt which may accrue at a future time, although there is no contract and no relation of any kind between the judgment debtor and the person sought to be made a garnishee at the time when the order is asked for? Merely to state such a proposition is enough to show that it is absurd, for, if it were true, an order might be made against anyone in the world. Then it must be something short of that; can it be this—a future debt, as to which there is some probability that it will arise? Who can say that is a debt in any sense? It is not a debt, and therefore that will not do. There must be something which the law recognises as a debt. In this rule, as well as in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 61, the words are "debts owing or accruing," and there are two decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench as to the meaning of those words in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. F G

In Jones v. Thompson (1), decided on s. 61 of that Act, CROMPTON, J., said (E.B. & E. at p. 63, 64):

"I myself at chambers have always acted on the supposition that the garnishee clauses apply only to cases in which there is an existing debt, though it may be only accruing. On that principle I have refused to make orders attaching rent before it became due, and instalments of an annuity not yet due, because they were not yet debts." H.

WIGHTMAN, J. said in the same case (ibid. at p. 64):

"[Counsel for the plaintiff] relies on the words 'or accruing,' but I think that these words are intended to apply to those cases in which there is debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro. I think that to bring the case within the statute there must be a debt, though it need not be yet due." I

And again, CROMPTON, J., said (ibid. at p. 64):

"There must, under this Act, be a debt as much as in bankruptcy. I do not agree that the use of the word 'accruing' makes a distinction on this point; there must be a debt, though it need not yet be due."

Anything more clear or decisive than that I cannot conceive; if we are to construe the words in Ord. 45, r. 2, in any other sense we must overrule that decision.

A In Tapp v. Jones (2), BLACKBURN, J., stated the law in the following terms (L.R. 10 Q.B. at p. 592):

"It is evident that the legislature had in view both present debts and future debts, debita in presenti, solvenda in futuro, for it speaks in the earlier part of the section of debts owing and accruing."

B It is obvious from this that he construed "debt accruing" in s. 61 as debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro. That is a debt known to the law, and which the law has always recognised. The law has always recognised two kinds of debts, a present debt, and debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro, and unless we are to put the interpretation on Ord. 45, r. 2, that the legislature has invented a new debt, I think we must adopt the view expressed in the two cases to which I have referred.

C It seems to me impossible to conceive that it was intended to invent a new debt. On the contrary, Ord. 45, r. 2, was framed after the decisions on the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which were well-known decisions, and contains the same words which had been interpreted in those cases in the way I have already stated. I am, therefore, of opinion that the meaning of accruing debt is debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro, and it does not comprise anything further, however

D probable it may be that in the result there will be a debt, and however soon a debt is likely to arise. That is the interpretation which I put upon the words of the rule.

Then is there anything in the cases which is inconsistent with this view? There is the decision of HALL, V.-C., in Re Cowan's Estate, Rapier v. Wright (3). I do not say the order made in that case was not right, because it seems to me that

E there was a debt due, and if so, it does not matter whether it was a legal or an equitable debt. If there was a debt the order was right, and was not void because it included what could not be attached. The only effect would be that when the order came to be put in force it would prove to be unavailing as to part of what was sought to be attached. Therefore I do not say that the order in that case was not right, but it seems to me that the learned Vice-Chancellor thought that something might be within Ord. 45, r. 2, which was not a debt at the time. If that was

F his view, I am bound to say that to that extent I differ from him.

Then our attention has been directed to the form of order in SETON ON DECREES (4th Edn.), which it is said was approved by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. I will leave the question as to these forms to be dealt with by the lords justices, who have had more experience in these matters than I have; but it cannot be said that we are

G differing from any decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.

Therefore for these reasons I put this interpretation on the rule. What it is sought to attach here is obviously not a debt. No one, either in a legal or an equitable sense, can say it is debitum. The trustees are not liable; there may be no proceeds of the property, or they may die or cease to be trustees before there are any. All that can be said is that it is probable that money will come into their hands, which, if it does come into their hands, they will be bound to pay over to the cestui que trust. Then there would be an equitable debt; but until then there is no debt. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and ought to be affirmed.

H

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point is one of some importance, and we are told that our decision is likely to disturb the existing practice. It is, therefore, necessary to look at the case very carefully. The question turns on the true construction of R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2, the words of which are substantially the same as those of s. 61 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. It is important to observe the language used. The affidavit must show that the garnishee is indebted to the judgment debtor, so we have to consider in what sense and to what extent a trustee is a debtor to his cestui que trust. I agree that the word debt includes equitable debts; but then is the trustee a debtor to his cestui que trust? I cannot say that he is, until he has money in his possession, which it is his duty to hand over. If a trustee has £1,000 in his hands which he is bound to hold in trust for another person, I agree that this is a debt, and may be attached; but take the case of a person being a trustee of consols: he has no money, and he may never receive any dividends; you cannot say there that the trustee is a debtor until he receives some money which it is his duty to pay over. Take again the more difficult case of a trustee holding land, or a share in a business, or railway shares; is the trustee in such a case a debtor before he has any money in his possession? It would be straining language to say he was. The language of the rule includes any debt; it may be an equitable debt or a legal debt, a debt payable in the present or a debt accruing, but it must be a debt. It may be an accruing debt, payable in the future in consequence of a present obligation. That is the view taken by the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in the cases to which the Master of the Rolls has referred.

I will consider the decision of HALL, V.-C., in Re Cowan's Estate (3), and I cannot read the judgment without seeing that the Vice-Chancellor was disposed to think that money coming to a cestui que trust from his trustee might be attached. The question there raised was whether money payable by a receiver was attachable, and the Vice-Chancellor decided that it was, and to that extent I agree that he was right. But with regard to moneys to become due, the Vice-Chancellor assumed he could make an order to attach such moneys, and to that extent I think the decision cannot be supported.

We have been referred to the forms in SETON ON DECREES (4th Edn.) at p. 312. The first form is that of a garnishee order nisi, and in point of form I think that order is unobjectionable; the words are "all debts due and owing or accruing due"; but in the form of the order absolute there is a departure from the language used in the form of the order nisi. The order absolute runs as follows:

"It is ordered that the defendant C. A., and the said S., the garnishee, do pay any sum or sums of money now in or hereafter to come to their hands as trustees of the will."

I do not know the circumstances under which this form of order was framed, and therefore whether the variation in language was the result of a slip, or was an intentional extension of the terms of the order nisi, I do not know, but in either case I am of opinion that the form of the order nisi is right, and that of the order absolute is wrong. The result seems to me to be this: you may attach all debts whether legal or equitable, but only debts owing or accruing, and money which may or may not become payable is not a debt. I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree with the conclusion at which the other members of the court have arrived; the case is important, and therefore I will add a few words.

In my judgment the contention that the words "is indebted" and the words "debts owing or accruing" in R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 45, r. 2, refer to the same subject-matter is correct. It seems to me to be plain that there must be an actual present debt, either equitable or legal. No doubt under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, there must have been a legal debt, for an equitable debt had no meaning in the courts of common law, unless it were in an equitable pleading. But Ord. 45 is dealing with both law and equity, and I think its meaning is that there must be a debt, which may be either legal or equitable. I have no doubt that the requirements of the rule are satisfied by a present debt, whether payable now or in future, and that the words include all such debts.

The material question to be considered is this: Does the rule include debts which may hereafter arise, but which may or may not come into existence according to circumstances? I am of opinion that such a conclusion is excluded by the words of r. 2 and also by r. 3, which provides that "service of an order that debts due or accruing to the judgment debtor shall be attached, on notice thereof to the garnishee, in such manner as the court or judge shall direct, shall bind such debts in his hands."

A It is impossible to say that a debt is in the hands of the garnishee when the debt does not exist. Then by r. 4, if the garnishee does not pay money into court, "and does not dispute the debt due or claimed to be due from him to the judgment debtor,"

B etc., execution may issue. How can a man be called upon to dispute a debt which does not exist? I cannot fail to see that there has been a difference of opinion as to the question.

The two decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench which have been referred to, Jones v. Thompson (1) and Tapp v. Jones (2), are not in unison with the language used by HALL, V.-C., in Re Cowan's Estate (3), where he said (14 Ch.D. at pp. 643, 644):

C "I consider therefore that the words of Ord. 45, r. 2, 'debts owing or accruing,' though they have been limited in construction by some authorities, ought not to be restricted so as to exclude such a fund as this, i.e., income ascertained to be the debtor's property during the whole of her life. To say that it should not be attached would be to leave her at liberty to deal with the future income by selling or mortgaging it. I cannot hold that such a construction of the rules would be the right one; on the contrary, I hold that the order nisi, which has been obtained rightly extended not only to the money actually in the hands of the receiver, if there were any at the time when it was made, but to future payments as well."

With that conclusion I cannot agree, and I adopt the construction adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench in the two cases to which I have referred.

E Holding, therefore, that the words of the rule only apply to debts due, whether payable in the present or in the future, I have to see whether they include the present case. Here there is clearly no debt payable in the present; is there any debt payable in the future? It seems to me that trustees are not equitable debtors to their cestui que trust until they have money in hand which they are bound to pay over, or until they are made liable for breach of trust, or for default in the performance of their duties as trustees. There is no suggestion in the Special Case that the trustees have any money in their hands which they are bound to pay over; on the contrary, the cestui que trust was overpaid at the date when the order was asked for. In my judgment the trustees were under no liability to pay money, and therefore the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

G I wish to observe that we are not laying down any rule which may have the effect of defeating the ends of justice, for I think there is power adequate to protect the interests of the judgment creditor. I think, if this is a proper case, a receiver might be appointed. I will make one more observation, as to the forms of order which have been relied on; although the orders in SETON ON DECREES may be useful as guides, still orders prepared at chambers are of less force than those which have undergone discussion in court.

Divorce—Costs—Husband's liability to pay wife's costs—Wife unsuccessful in suit—Liability to pay costs not limited to amount of security.

Where a husband petitioner has been successful in a divorce suit against his wife, he is liable to pay his wife's solicitors their full costs unless they have been guilty of misconduct in the conduct of the defence, and not merely the amount he gave as security for these costs prior to the hearing of the suit.

Appeal by the wife from an order of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., granting the husband petitioner a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the respondent wife's adultery. On the granting of the decree the learned judge also made an order as to the wife's costs of the suit, by which the husband was directed to pay her costs limited to the amount of the security he had given for the same. The wife contended that (i) on the evidence she was entitled to succeed on the merits, and (ii) in any event she was entitled to all the costs of the suit. The Court of Appeal dismissed her appeal on the first of the above grounds and the case is only reported on the issue of costs.

The wife appeared in person.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Dr. Middleton for the husband.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—The practice seems to be to require the husband to give security, or deposit in court, a sum to answer the wife's costs properly incurred. It seems also to be the practice that where the wife fails in her defence, and costs are awarded to her solicitor, the whole of his costs properly incurred are not ordered to be taxed, but only his costs properly incurred not exceeding the amount for which security has been given. In fairness to SIR JAMES HANNEN, it is right to say that this practice did not originate with him. He only follows the practice of his predecessors, SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL and LORD PENZANCE. The old practice of the ecclesiastical court was to tax and pay the whole of the wife's costs before the hearing. That was not limited to any sum secured or assessed

A beforehand. That was a very proper practice, and the reason why this practice has been departed from is very curious.

In the ecclesiastical court the whole evidence was taken by affidavit, before the cause came on to be heard, so that there was no difficulty in taxing the costs before the hearing. But when the Divorce Court was established in 1857 the English practice of oral evidence was introduced so that it then became impossible to tax the costs a priori. It is impossible to know beforehand what witnesses will be called or what their expenses will be. The practice was, therefore, introduced of making the husband give security for his wife's costs, and then, following a false analogy after the hearing, he was ordered to pay the taxed costs limited to the amount which, before the hearing, had only been guessed at. It is highly proper that a husband should pay for the costs of his wife's defence upon a charge of adultery. That is founded upon the old English law which gives the wife's property absolutely to her husband. It is, perhaps, easy for a husband to say that it is hard upon him to have to pay the charges of a false defence. That is his misfortune. But what is the wife able to say on the other hand? She may have brought her husband a fortune of £50,000, and yet be left without the means of defending herself against a false charge of unfaithfulness. Some means must be provided for the wife to carry on her defence, and that defence must be taken up by a solicitor. The solicitor must be paid for his services, and he can only look to the husband for payment. As SIR JAMES HANNEN said in Flower v. Flower (1), it is not the solicitor's fault that the wife is wrong, and he is not to lose the fair reward of his labour merely because the defence is not successful. Therefore, unless the solicitor himself has been guilty of misconduct in the conduct of the defence, he ought not to be deprived of his remuneration; but, on the contrary, when he has fairly and properly conducted the defence, the solicitor is entitled to be paid his full costs.

There is no ground in this case for saying that we cannot review the order, because the learned judge did not exercise his discretion at all; he only made the usual order as to the wife's costs. He only followed a rule which we, sitting as a Court of Appeal, consider to be erroneous. There is no suggestion in this case that the solicitor has not acted properly, and therefore he ought to have his full costs. Moreover, in disposing of this question, the old rule of the House of Lords upon divorce bills ought not to be lost sight of, which might be called the nobler rule, that no man of right feeling would wish that his wife should not have the means of fairly defending herself against so odious a charge. As Mrs. Robertson has failed upon one part of her appeal, but has succeeded on the other point, there will be no costs to either party.

COTTON, L.J.—On the question of costs, in my opinion this order cannot stand.

H It is unnecessary to go into the question whether it is just or not that the husband should provide for the costs of the wife. That was the old established rule in the ecclesiastical court; it was the practice of the House of Lords when bills were introduced for divorce, and it was founded on this. When the wife has to take proceedings against her husband, or he against her—all her property being in him—she ought to be provided at his expense with the means of bringing her case before the court or of properly defending the case brought against her; and whether she is successful or not, in my opinion the rule is to this effect, that the costs properly incurred in bringing her suit before the court, or in defending the attack made on her, ought to be paid by her husband. The order here does not say that these costs had been improperly incurred, but it gives the wife, or rather the solicitor employed by her, the costs of the defence, limited not to the amount at which they shall be ascertained by taxation but to the amount which has been paid into court, or which has been secured in consequence of someone, who could only guess, fixing a sum which probably would be sufficient to pay all costs properly incurred.

In my opinion that is quite wrong; and when one looks at r. 159, that in my opinion points to something rather different. It gives the judge a discretion in this way; that where there are certain steps taken improperly by those who are acting on behalf of the wife—witnesses called who ought not to have been called, and so on—those are costs which in his discretion he may disallow. But, in my opinion, it is not a proper thing under that order to say, “although I do not consider in my discretion that certain issues ought not to have been raised, or that certain witnesses ought not to have been called, I limit the amount of the wife’s costs to the estimate made before the amount was known.” That, in my opinion, is not a proper reading of this rule, and, as we can do it, the practice which has hitherto prevailed must be considered as one which is no longer to be followed.

Appeal as to costs allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (ON THE RELATION OF DEVERILL) v. DORKING UNION GUARDIANS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ.), March 22, 24, 1882]

Sewage—Disposal—Nuisance—Local authority—Right to stop up sewer causing nuisance—Obligation to bring actions to restrain persons wrongfully using sewer—Injunction to compel performance of act beyond authority’s powers.

The relator, the owner of land bounded by a stream into which was discharged sewage from a sewer within the district of the defendants, a sanitary authority, alleged that the sewer was vested in the sanitary authority, that it was being used not only by persons who had a prescriptive right to discharge their sewage into it, but also by persons who had no such right, and that such user had become a nuisance, which was constantly increasing. He sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from causing or permitting sewage to be conveyed through the sewer into the stream other than sewage so conveyed by prescriptive right before the commencement of the action. The defendants had been endeavouring to provide a system of drainage for the district, but hitherto had been unable, without any negligence on their part, to acquire the necessary land.

Held: (i) by s. 27 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [see now s. 31 of the Public Health Act, 1936], the defendants were prohibited from creating any nuisance in the exercise of their powers to dispose of sewage, and, therefore, they could not stop up the sewer which would cause a great nuisance to the inhabitants of the district; their efforts to obtain facilities for constructing a new system of drainage had been unavailing; and an injunction would not be granted which would have the effect of compelling them to do something which they had no power to do: (ii) an action against the defendants for a mandatory injunction directing them to bring actions for injunctions to restrain persons who were not entitled to use the sewer from doing so would not lie.

Appeal from a decision of HALL, V.-C., in an action for an injunction.

H

The relator, John Croft Deverill, was the owner and occupier of a dwelling-house, stables, gardens, meadow, and appurtenances in the parish of Dorking (the population of which in 1851 exceeded 5,000), bounded on the north by a stream flowing from west to east called the Pipp Brook; on the east by the river Mole, into which the Pipp Brook flowed; on the south by the grounds of another house; and on the west by a public thoroughfare called Pixham Lane. The plaintiff and his family had lived in this house for upwards of ten years. The town of Dorking lay to the south-west of the plaintiff's house. On Jan. 17, 1879, the action was commenced by the Attorney-General at the relation of the relator, against the guardians of the poor of the union of Dorking, the sanitary authority for the district. The statement of claim was delivered on Dec. 12, 1879, and alleged that the sewage of the entire town of Dorking and of a large portion of the parish was discharged by sewers and drains into the Pipp Brook, injuriously affecting the purity of the water to such an extent that the houses on the northern outskirts of the town were rendered unwholesome, and that the air was impregnated with an odour injurious to the public health; that the house of a miller was rendered almost uninhabitable by the state of the water; and that the relator and his family were most injuriously affected by the state of a pond called the Pixham Mill Pond, which was fed by the Pipp Brook, it being the practice to dam up the water at night after the mill had ceased working, and to let the water flow down in the morning, at which time particularly, it was stated, the rush of sewage down the stream was intolerable. The statement of claim then alleged that the defendants had used since the passing of the Health Act, 1875, and "now used" the said sewers for the purpose of carrying sewage into the Pipp Brook; that since 1875 new houses had been erected within the district in constantly increasing numbers, from which the sewage was being discharged through newly-constructed drains into the old sewers vested in the defendants; that the persons by whom such connections were made had not acquired any prescriptive right to throw into the sewers any sewage or filthy water; and that the public nuisance and private injury would increase unless restrained by the court. The Attorney-General claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from causing or permitting the sewage or filthy water of the town or parish of Dorking, or any part thereof, to be conveyed through the sewers or drains within the sanitary district of Dorking (other than sewage or filthy water so conveyed by prescriptive right before the commencement of the action) into the Pipp Brook or into the ponds or lakes fed by the brook unless and until such sewage and filthy water had been sufficiently purified and deodorised so as not to create a nuisance.

By an amended statement of defence, delivered on May 25, 1880, the defendants denied that the whole, and said that only a portion, of the sewage of Dorking was discharged into the Pipp Brook, inasmuch as a great number of houses in Dorking were drained by means of cesspools. They denied that they had used, or were using, any sewers or drains for the purpose of carrying sewage into the brook, and said that the sewers and drains now in existence had been used for a great number of years, and before the house occupied by the relator was built; that the lessee of Pipp Brook Mill had recently taken a fresh lease of the premises, and continued to reside with his family in the house attached to the mill without inconvenience, and denied the fact of there being any nuisance.

They further said that in 1876 they had promoted a scheme for conveying the sewage of the town on to land in the adjoining parish of Mickleham, but the scheme met with so much opposition that it had to be abandoned after costing the defendants nearly £1,000; that they were now, in conjunction with the adjoining parish of Leatherhead, applying to the Local Government Board to constitute a district known as the Dorking Special Drainage District, and the parish of Leatherhead into a united district for the purpose of carrying out a system of sewerage under the provisions of s. 279 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and that such an application was made on Nov. 27, 1878, and was still before the local board for consideration. They further said that there were no sewers whatever vested in the defendants. The sewer referred to in the statement of claim, and all other sewers and drains in the district were either private sewers made by private persons under private roads, or drains vested in or under the control of authorities having the management of roads not being local authorities under the Public Health Act, 1875, and over which the defendants had no control. The defendants had made no connection with any public sewer, and they had no power to prevent owners or occupiers from making connections with or using the sewers. If any nuisance was created, which the defendants did not admit, the plaintiff ought to proceed against the persons who made connections with and used the sewers. The defendants did not admit that the houses had no prescriptive right to send their sewage into the brook, and said that that question could only be tried by proceedings against the owners or occupiers.

On Jan. 12, 1881, the action came on to be heard before HALL, V.-C., who gave judgment for the defendants. The Attorney-General appealed.

Horace Davey, Q.C., and Latham for the Attorney-General.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

A SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This court is bound, as the court below was bound, by the decision in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), and even if I differed, which I do not, from the conclusions arrived at by the Court of Appeal in that case, I should be bound to decide this case in accordance with it unless I saw some substantial difference. As it appears to me there is no substantial difference whatever; indeed, I will go further, and say that there is no tangible difference, if I may use such an expression.

B As I understand Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), there were sewers vested in the defendants, the local board, and I will assume that the sewers in the present case are vested in the guardians, or that they were vested in them at the time when this action was brought. It was undoubtedly so in the case of the local board in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1). In that respect, C therefore, the two cases are alike. In the next place it is admitted here and was proved there that, as regards a large portion of the sewers, there are prescriptive rights, that is, that there are a number of persons who have the right, having used the sewer for more than twenty years, to send their drainage down the sewer. In the present case the main sewer was made more than twenty-four years ago, and it has been used ever since, and largely used. In Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth D Local Board (1), it appears that one of the sewers had been used certainly from the time of Oliver Cromwell, if not before, and, therefore, it was a very old sewer indeed, subject to a question whether another sewer had not been substituted for it with the right to persons having a prescriptive right to use the substituted sewer as they had used the old sewer. In that respect the two cases are alike. In the next place, this is the same as Glossop's Case (1) in that it is a case of gradual E increase of nuisance. That is, in addition to the persons who have prescriptive rights, there are a great many people who have no prescriptive rights but drain their houses into this sewer, and by reason of that additional sewage the nuisance to the plaintiff's stream is very much increased.

The defendants say that in order to construct a new system of drainage, which is what they ought to do, and what they intend to do when they can, they must F acquire land; and they have endeavoured to acquire land, but unfortunately they have not been successful. They are making further endeavours which they hope will be successful. Upon that point, I think it is as well to show what they have done. The action in the present case was commenced on Jan. 17, 1879. The Public Health Act, 1872 [repealed by Public Health Act, 1875], came into operation on Aug. 10 of that year, and as early as in October the defendants employed Sir G Joseph Bazalgette to report. He reported in December of that year. They found a G difficulty in dealing with his report because they thought that the sewer did not comprise the whole, and consequently, after a great deal of deliberation, they applied, in December, 1874, to the Local Government Board to make them a new drainage district. The Local Government Board do not seem to have hurried themselves for it was not until February, 1877, that the request was complied with. H During the interval the defendants employed another engineer, Mr. Birch, and he told them to get twelve acres of land to make the sewage works. They gave notices accordingly, whereupon the Local Government Board directed one of their inspectors to hold an inquiry under the Local Government Act. This inquiry took place, but they were so strongly opposed that their counsel advised them not to contest the matter further, but to give it up and try to get some other power. We I are told by affidavit that these abortive proceedings cost the defendants upwards of £1,000. Therefore, they were in earnest.

They started again, and after they got the new power, the Local Government Board, in June, 1878, appointed a committee to confer with the representatives of the parish of Leatherhead as to a joint scheme, and another application was made on Nov. 27, 1878, to constitute the Dorking Special Drainage District and the parish of Leatherhead a united district. In November, 1879, this action having been brought in January, 1879, the Local Government Board directed an inquiry to be held before Mr. Arnold Taylor upon the application. He made an adverse report, and thereupon the Board declined to proceed with the matter further until a portion of the parish of Leatherhead was constituted a special drainage district. Now, such last-mentioned special drainage district having recently been formed, the application of the defendants is still before the Local Government Board for consideration. They go on to say in their affidavit that they have by every means in their power sought to obtain suitable land for the reception of the sewage, but without success, and they are now, in addition to the aforementioned application to the Local Government Board, seeking the advice of their engineer, Mr. Birch, as to an alternative scheme to be proceeded with, should such application be refused. They are not neglecting to put their general powers into execution any more than the defendants were in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1). I especially mention this because I do not wish it to be inferred that, if these public bodies do neglect to exercise their power, that is a reason for not compelling them to exercise it. However, that is not the present case.

This being the position of matters, what does the relator complain of? He says this: "The sewers being vested in you, the defendants, you allow or permit persons having no prescriptive right of drainage to drain through your sewers into my stream, and thereby cause additional and serious additional pollution." There are two points to be considered here. Would the relator have any right of action at common law irrespective of these Acts of Parliament, by reason of this ownership of the sewers which I assume for this purpose is vested in the defendants; and, secondly, if he would not, does the Rivers Pollution Act or any other Act give him a right of action?

As to the first point, which does not seem to have been very much discussed in the previous case, we must remember that the vesting of the sewers in the local authority gives them a very limited right of ownership. I am not prepared to say that they are in the same position as a landowner through whose land a sewer, an artificial work, runs. It by no means follows that they have the same rights as he has. He can stop up the sewer without asking anybody. But as I read this Act of Parliament I am by no means prepared to say that this local sanitary board can stop the sewer up, and thereby cause a most frightful nuisance to the inhabitants of the district whose drainage it is their business to protect and perfect. That is the first difficulty in the way—that the vesting is not an absolute right of ownership, but a modified and limited right of ownership, and it does not, in my opinion, give them a right to stop up the sewer. But, even assuming they had an absolute right of ownership, could they bring an action at law? I think they could not.

This is the case of a landowner with running through his land a sewer, through which persons above have a prescriptive right of drainage and of sending sewage. He cannot stop up the sewer against them. But other persons also above who have no such prescriptive right send sewage down the sewer. As he cannot stop up the sewer, how is he to prevent it? I know of no means except by bringing an action and obtaining an injunction to prevent the persons who were not entitled to drain into the sewer doing so. Whether he could get such an injunction or not must depend upon circumstances. In the case I put, it by no means follows that he sustains any damage. It may be utterly immaterial to him, as it is in this case, whether there is more or less sewage thrown down. It does not matter to him in the least. Could he maintain an injunction? My present impression is that he could, but if he could not maintain an injunction then, these people, by going on for twenty years, would get a prescriptive right, and he would be entitled to an injunction upon the ground of permanent injury to his property by prescription being acquired over it. Therefore, for this purpose, he could get an injunction. Then the person whose land is situated lower down the stream which is polluted says: "You can obtain an injunction to restrain these people sending the sewage down your sewer, and, therefore, I will bring an action against you." What for? "Because you do not bring an action for an injunction against the people who are sending the sewage through your land." Suppose he says: "I do not care about prescription; so many people already have prescriptive rights of sending this sewage

A into the sewer that I do not care about other people getting them too." Is he compelled to bring an action for the purpose of asserting his title to prevent a prescription as to which he is perfectly indifferent? It is a most singular thing to say so.

B Independently of that, did one ever hear of an action against a man because he did not bring an action against his neighbour. It is impossible to suppose that any such action could be maintained. If one could maintain it, one would get an injunction against a man for not bringing an injunction action against his neighbour. As it is the only means of preventing the nuisance, it comes to an order that he shall bring an action for an injunction against all his neighbours who are sending sewage down without a prescriptive right into the sewer. That is, he would have to fight in every case the question of prescription and acquiescence, and fifty other questions which might arise. How can we tell in the absence of the people what the defence might be? He may have lost his right by acquiescence or in various other ways. No such action has ever been heard of at common law, and I am sure no such action has ever been heard of in equity. If there is no action at common law where do you get the right under the statute? The only rights under the statute are given to prevent the local authority from committing a nuisance. They say: "We have done nothing at all. We found the sewers in this state, and we left them there." Besides that they have a general scheme of drainage which they are endeavouring to put in force, and as to which I say, without negligence or without the imputation of negligence upon them, they are doing the best they can. Is that a case which gives the relator any right to an injunction? I think it does not.

E I come to the last ground. It appears to me that there is one sentence in the judgment of CORON, L.J., in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), which puts an end to this case altogether. He says this (12 Ch.D. at p. 127):

F "But it would be contrary to the course of the court to make a decree of that nature against the defendants, unless the court is satisfied that there is some particular mode by which they can carry into effect this scheme of drainage, and in that way exercise the powers of this Act of Parliament."

The court is asked to enjoin a man or corporation under penalties to prevent a state of things being allowed to continue without being aware of any means by which he can stop it. Surely that cannot be right. You are not to send a man to prison for not preventing what he cannot prevent. In A.-G. v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum (2) LORD HATHERLEY said that one could not make an order to do a thing which was impossible. I agree with the statement of CORON, L.J., that before you can make an order directing a man to do something—for that is the effect of the injunction; it is negative in form, but it is positive in fact—you must be satisfied that he can do it. As I said before, I am not only not so satisfied, but, upon the present evidence, I think the defendants cannot prevent the use of the sewer which is complained of.

H There is one other ground that was not mentioned in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), but which appears to me to be a very important ground, and that is that, in granting an injunction which is a very delicate jurisdiction, the court always looks at the balance of convenience. I agree that where there has been an injury to the plaintiff's property, it is no answer to say: "We have invaded your property because it is more convenient to us." But where there is a continuance of a state of things which you find existing, and which it is only by the intervention of Parliamentary powers you can stop, would it be right to grant an injunction when you cannot compel the exercise of the Parliamentary powers, the effect of which would be to cause a most frightful injury to the town of Dorking? I am now assuming that they could physically stop up the sewer. Would it be right to order them to stop it up, leaving the town of Dorking to go undrained, and so probably cause disease, which would be utter destruction to the town, because there is a temporary injury to the plaintiff? That is a consideration which the court must not lose sight of when it is asked to grant a mandatory injunction. I am by no means prepared to say what the rights of the plaintiff would be if the defendants neglected to put in force their Parliamentary powers, but I am prepared to say that the court would find some remedy for him in that case.

It appears to me that this case is not fairly distinguishable from Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), and that the learned judge in the court below rightly considered himself bound by that case in coming to the conclusion that he did, and I think that we are equally bound, and, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case I assume that the sewers are vested in the defendants. It is not necessary in the view which I take to give any opinion upon it in this case, but I assume, for the purpose of the argument, what I have no doubt is the case, that the stream in which the relator is interested is in a very bad state and is becoming daily worse. But does that entitle the relator to a decree and injunction against the defendants? The defendants are doing nothing. They are not making any new sewer or being active in exercising any power which they have under the Public Health Act, of turning sewage into any different course from that in which it previously went. In that state of things, in my opinion, the case is exactly the same in principle, although there are minute differences, as Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1). I adhere to the opinion that was there expressed by me.

True, under the Act of Parliament these sewers have become vested in the defendants [see Public Health Act, 1936, s. 7]. Under the Act they cannot close up those sewers without providing that which is necessary for the purpose of carrying away the sewage, nor can they close up any sewer which would create a nuisance [see s. 31 of Act of 1936]. Could it be for a moment said that closing up this sewer without providing another system of sewage would not cause a great nuisance to every householder who had previously drained into these sewers? It is not only so as regards those already drained into the brook; but, under the Act of Parliament, every householder has a right, if his house is within a certain distance of this sewer, of conducting his drain into it, and, that being so, no permission is required from the defendants to enable any householder having a new or old house to connect his drain with this sewer. Therefore, they are not using their sewer for the purpose of carrying this drainage in the same way as a body or a person would be doing who permitted or allowed persons to turn their sewage into a sewer when those persons could not make any connection with the sewer except by the permission or with the authority of the person in whom the sewer was vested. In my opinion, therefore, it cannot be said that the defendants are using this sewer for the purpose of conveying this sewage, which I assume, causes a nuisance to the plaintiff.

It is said that that would not be in accordance with s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [s. 31 of the Act of 1936], which says:

“Nothing in this Act shall authorise any local authority to make or use any sewer, drain, or outfall for the purpose of conveying sewage or filthy water into any natural stream or watercourse. . . .”

I pointed out how, in my opinion, they are not to be considered as themselves using, either by conveying, or by granting permission for sewage to be conveyed, into the stream by means of this sewer. The construction of the section is, as I understand it, that the Act does not give authority to use or do anything so as to commit a nuisance, and, as was pointed out by JAMES, L.J., and I think also by myself, in our judgments in the Glossop Case (1), that it comes simply to this, that, if you want, for the purpose of doing anything, to rely upon authority given by the Act, you must do that thing so as not to commit a nuisance. Here the defendants are doing nothing. They are not constructing a new system of sewers. It was said that they are using this sewer by allowing it to be used as part of the existing

A system of drainage, which is vested in them. They are not substituting a new system of sewage, and, in my opinion, the mere fact that they have not substituted a new system of sewage cannot make a using of this sewer by them, when it is used without any leave granted by them, under the rights which are granted by the Act to householders.

That being so, in my opinion, they are doing no illegal act; and the injunction ought not to be granted. But it is said that they can prevent this being done, and, therefore, that an injunction ought to be granted for the purpose, as I understand the argument, of compelling them to exercise for the benefit of the plaintiff those rights which they have of preventing this nuisance. I have dealt with the question of closing up the sewer. It is said that they may prevent the nuisance in two ways, by bringing an action or by taking proceedings under the powers of the Act against the persons who are in fact causing the nuisance by sending their sewage into the sewer. The Master of the Rolls has dealt with this part of the case, and, I must say, except where a person has bound himself by contract to bring an action—which, of course, is a different question—I never heard of anyone bringing an action against another person because that other person did not bring an action which the plaintiff could as well bring himself. If here there is a nuisance committed by the persons who are sending their sewage, either de novo or continuing to send it, into the sewer, and thence into the stream, the plaintiff can bring an action just as well as the defendants, except that it is said he has not the same knowledge. But does the fact that the defendants know of evidence which the plaintiff does not know entitle the plaintiff to bring an action against the defendants for not bringing an action which the plaintiff himself at law may bring, although he may have some difficulty in proving his case? I never heard of any such principle and, in my opinion, there is none.

It was said—and that was, I think, really the principal argument—that, although the defendants here are not actively doing anything which causes the nuisance, although they are doing nothing the doing of which can be stopped by granting an injunction, they may indirectly be compelled to exercise the powers of an Act of Parliament which would be a benefit to the plaintiff by preventing the sewage coming into the stream. I repeat here what I said in the Glossop Case (1), that, in my opinion, if that is the object to be attained, it ought to be done by an order directing the defendants to exercise their powers, and not by way of injunction, which is to have that indirect effect.

Independently of that, there has been no default, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, on the part of the defendants to exercise their powers. They have been trying to exercise their powers, but they cannot do so. There is a fatal objection to what is asked by the relator as the ground for the injunction. In my opinion, it would not be right to grant an injunction to restrain the defendants from allowing this sewage to come into the stream, when it does not appear that there is any means under the authority given by the Act of Parliament by which they can divert the sewage from the stream. It is said that that is contrary to all the cases decided with reference to this matter. In my opinion, it is contrary to not one of them. In all the cases which have been referred to, the defendants who were restrained had done something actively to turn the sewage into the stream or on to the land of the parties complaining of it. In the present case it is not material to consider whether the defendants could get rid of their sewage by any other means. The Act of Parliament has given them power to get rid of their sewage, provided they can do so without committing a nuisance. If they cannot do so without committing a nuisance the Act of Parliament does not authorise them to do it, and they are in the same position as individuals who do a wrong to their neighbour without any Parliamentary authority. It is immaterial to consider whether it could be done under any of the powers given to them by the Act without committing a nuisance. Here the defendants are doing nothing, and they are sought to be compelled to exercise the powers of the Act, when it does not appear that the exercise of the powers would prevent the injury or loss to the relator of which he complains. In my opinion, that would be a fatal objection to the granting of an injunction for the purpose which the relator here tries to achieve indirectly by his application for an injunction. In my opinion, the decree dismissing the information and bill was right, and, therefore, the decree appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add, having looked carefully at Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1), I do not see how to distinguish this case from that in substance.

MURRAY v. SCOTT
AGNEW v. MURRAY
BRIMELOW v. MURRAY

[House of Lords (The Earl of Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson), April 24, 25, 28, 29, May 23, 1884]

[Reported 9 App. Cas. 519; 53 L.J.Ch. 745; 51 L.T. 462;
33 W.R. 173]

Building Society—Borrowing money—Power to borrow—Rule authorising borrowing, without limit of amount specified, “as occasion may require”—Borrowed money charged on funds and property of society—Credit of members not pledged—Validity of rule.

Building Society—Rule—Validity—Rule valid unless effect to make society different from building society formed and carried on under Building Societies Acts.

By a rule of a building society enrolled under the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 (passed in 1836 to regulate building societies and repealed by the Building Societies Act, 1874): “The trustees or directors for the time being of this society may, from time to time as occasion may require, borrow and take up at interest any sum or sums of money from the society’s banker, or from any banker, or from any other person or persons; any borrowed money shall be a first charge on the funds and property of the company.”

The only real and true limit of the rule-making power of a building society as to a matter not governed by the general law of the realm or by any express statutory prohibition is that the power cannot be exercised so as to make the society a thing different from a building society formed for the purposes and in the manner defined by the Building Societies Acts. It might have that effect if the rule authorised borrowing, or the use of money borrowed, for purposes other than those of a building society within the Acts, or if it enabled the trustees or directors to pledge the credit of the individual members of the society without limit in a manner inconsistent with the limitation of the value and amount of the shares and subscriptions by which the common stock or fund of the society was to be raised as prescribed by the Acts. The rule set out above did neither of those things. It only authorised borrowing “as occasion may require,” manifestly for no other purposes than the proper purposes of the society. It did not authorise the trustees or directors to pledge in any way the personal credit of any individual members of the society. It expressly

- A made all borrowed money "a first charge on the funds and property of the society," of which the base was necessarily the total amount of the contributions of members, and the creditors could have no recourse except against such funds and property. Accordingly, the rule, although it contained no limitation on the amount to be borrowed, was valid, and persons advancing money to the society under it were entitled to rank as creditors against the assets of the society in priority to the members thereof of all classes.
- B So held by the Court of Appeal.

C Per LORD BLACKBURN: Although a limit as to the amount which the trustees or directors are authorised to borrow is obviously highly expedient, I do not see how such a limitation can on any principle be said to affect the question whether the borrowing is repugnant to the principles of the society. . . . A rule authorising borrowing so as to charge the funds of the society, but not the persons of the members, is valid though there is no limit placed on the amount which can be borrowed.

Appeals from decisions of the Court of Appeal (SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., COTTON and BOWEN, L.J.J.) in appeals from the Vice-Chancellor of the Chancery Court of Lancaster (H. F. Bristowe, Q.C.), in cases arising in the winding-up of the Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society, reported 23 Ch.D. 440.

In the first case the appeal was brought by Mr. Adam Murray, the official liquidator of the Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society, from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of the Vice-Chancellor. The society carried on business in Manchester. It was formed in 1870, and was enrolled under the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. It was being wound-up in the Lancaster Chancery Court, under an order made on Nov. 14, 1881. The rules contained the following:

"Rule 32. The trustees or directors for the time being of this society may, from time to time as occasion may require, borrow and take up at interest any

- A sum or sums of money from the society's banker, or from any banker, or from any other person or persons; any borrowed money shall be a first charge on the funds and property of the company."

The rules when printed were submitted to the barrister appointed to certify the rules of building societies and certified by him.

- B On appeal from the Vice-Chancellor the Court of Appeal held that r. 32, being a rule giving an unlimited power of borrowing money to the directors of a building society, was void although it had been certified by the certifying barrister, and that persons advancing money under it on the security of the deposit of the title deeds of borrowing members must, in the winding-up of the society, give up their securities and prove against the residue of the assets after payment of the outside creditors and unadvanced members.

- D Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 23, 1884. The following opinions were read.

- THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—The principal question on these appeals is as to the validity of r. 32 which authorises the trustees or directors of the Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society to borrow money "from time to time as occasion may require," without any limitation of the amount to be so borrowed, but with the provision that "any borrowed money shall be a first charge on the funds and property of the society." The words, "as occasion may require," when read in connection with the rest of the rules, necessarily mean when and as there may be occasion to borrow money for the purposes and objects of the society, as defined by r. 1. Any borrowing for other purposes, or other objects, would be a breach of the duty of the trustees or directors under those rules, and certainly cannot be taken to be authorised by the terms of r. 32. In point of fact no money was borrowed or applied for any unauthorised purpose. Rule 32 has all the force and authority which it can derive from the mutual contract and agreement of the members of the society, and from the certificate and allowance of the barrister appointed for that purpose under the Friendly Societies Acts, incorporated (by reference) into the [repealed] Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 [which regulated benefit building societies], under which this society was formed. Unless, therefore, it was illegal and ultra vires for the members of such a society to make and for the barrister to allow and certify such a rule, the debts contracted by virtue of it are well charged upon the general funds and property of the society, and ought to be allowed and provided for out of such funds and property in priority to the shares and interests of all classes of members.

- H The Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the Court of Appeal, considered it to have been settled, by authorities which they ought to follow, that any rule of such a society, formed under the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, by which borrowing money without some limit of amount was authorised, was repugnant to and inconsistent with the provisions of that statute, and, therefore, incapable of being made legal by any consent of members or allowance of the certifying barrister. But, when the authorities which were supposed to establish this proposition are referred to, none of them is found to be really a decision upon that point; they all seem to depend upon a dictum of LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., in Laing v. Reed (1), to the effect that, although a limited borrowing power, if expressly given by a rule duly certified, would be good (as was decided in that case), a rule authorising the trustees "to raise an unlimited sum of money wholly regardless of the contributions which might be made by the members," would be "contrary to the intent and scope of the Act." I am not sure in what sense these words "wholly regardless of the contributions," etc., were meant by LORD HATHERLEY to be understood, but I subscribe to the doctrine laid down in the same case by GIFFARD, L.J., that the test ought to be whether the rule (not being contrary to any express prohibition in the statute) was one which made the society "a thing different from a benefit building society." If not, and if it "merely provided a method of conducting business" (i.e., the proper business of a benefit building society), it could not be illegal or ultra vires, being made by the proper authority, and certified in the proper manner. Without disparagement to the weight justly due to those learned judges who in several later cases have referred, with apparent approval and concurrence, to LORD HATHERLEY's dictum, I think that in this state of authority the point cannot be regarded as settled, and that your Lordships ought to decide it according to your own view of the true effect of the statute.

Upon principle it seems clear that if a borrowing power may be (as both LORD HATHERLEY and GIFFARD, L.J., rightly, in my opinion, decided it to be) not only consistent with, but reasonably conducive to, the proper objects of a benefit building society (though not so necessary as to be implied unless expressly given), it must be competent for the members of the society to make, and for the barrister to certify, a rule conferring such a power, and if it be contended that such a power could only be given under certain conditions and limitations, the law prescribing and defining those conditions and limitations must be in some way discoverable from the statute, otherwise the authority competent to give the power must also be competent to define its extent, and to prescribe the conditions (if any) under which it is to be exercised. In Laing v. Reed (1) the power was expressly limited, so that the money borrowed was at no time to exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured by mortgages to the society, and the same limit has since been prescribed by law to societies within the Building Societies Act, 1874 [repealed except for ss. 1, 4, 7, & s. 32 (partly) by Building Societies Act, 1962], by which rules giving borrowing powers are expressly authorised. But the subject is not in any way regulated, or even so much as mentioned, in the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, and the particular terms in which LORD HATHERLEY expressed himself in Laing v. Reed (1) were probably influenced by the circumstances of the case which he had then before him.

The only limitations of the general power to make rules and regulations conferred by the Act of Will. 4 upon the members of such societies (beyond the necessity of having them certified), which are discoverable from the statute, are generally and equally applicable to all such rules and regulations. They must be (i) "Wholesome rules and regulations for the government and guidance of the society," that is, of a society formed for the purposes and in the manner defined by the Act; (ii) not repugnant to any express provisions of the Act; and (iii) not repugnant to the general laws of the realm. It cannot be alleged that the omission of the rule in question to prescribe any fixed or ascertainable limit of the amount to be borrowed is repugnant to any express prohibition of the Act, or to any general law of the realm. Nor can it reasonably be contended that the word "wholesome" renders every rule or regulation (though agreed to by the members of the society and duly certified) void in law if, in the opinion of a court of justice, it is of more or less questionable expediency, or not accompanied by all such checks and safeguards as a judge may think desirable for excluding the possibility of any abuse.

The only real and true limit of the rule-making power, as to a matter not governed by the general law of the realm or by any express prohibition in the statute, must be that pointed out by GIFFARD, L.J. The power cannot be so exercised as to make the society a thing different from a benefit building society formed for the purposes and in the manner defined by the Act. It might have that effect if the rule authorised borrowing, or the use of money borrowed, for purposes other than those of a benefit building society, as so defined, or if it enabled the trustees or directors to pledge the credit of the individual members of the society without limit in a manner inconsistent with the limitation of the value and amount of the shares and subscriptions by which the common stock or fund of the society was to be raised as

A prescribed by the Act. But the rule now in question does neither of these things. It only authorises borrowing "as occasion may require," manifestly (as I have already said) for no other purposes than the proper purposes of the society, which appears, by all the other rules, to be a benefit building society, as defined by the Act, and nothing else. It does not authorise the trustees or directors to pledge, in any way, the personal credit of any individual members of the society (unless indeed they think fit, by way of security only, to pledge their own); it expressly makes all borrowed money "a first charge on the funds and property of the society," of which the base is necessarily the total amount of the contributions of members, and the creditors can have no recourse except against such funds and property.

C I am, therefore, of opinion that r. 32 of this society is valid in law, and that the appellants in Brimelow v. Murray and Agnew v. Murray are entitled to rank as creditors against the assets of the society in priority to the members thereof of all classes, including those represented by the respondents in Murray v. Scott, as to whom the order, which is the subject of the appeal of Murray v. Scott, is, in my opinion, correct, and ought to be affirmed.

D The only other point on which I think it necessary to say anything is as to the claim of the creditors represented by the appellants Brimelow and Agnew to special equitable charges upon certain properties mortgaged to the society, the title deeds of which were deposited with them by way of security for the advances made by them under r. 32. I think that this claim is inconsistent with the true meaning of that rule, which I understand to be that all the moneys borrowed under it are to have the benefit, equally and pari passu, of a first charge upon the general funds and property of the society. If the directors could pledge particular assets of the society to particular lenders under that rule, the other lenders under the same rule would be deprived pro tanto of that first charge which the rule gives them, and the successive borrowing operations would have a different incidence upon the funds of the society from that intended and authorised. I, therefore, agree on this point (though for a different reason) with the reversal by the Court of Appeal of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of Lancaster. The several orders complained of by the appeals of Brimelow v. Murray and Agnew v. Murray ought, therefore, in my opinion, to be reversed, except so far as they direct the delivery up to the official liquidator of the deeds and documents therein respectively mentioned. For the rest of both those orders there should be substituted a declaration to the following effect: "That subject to and after payment in full of the costs of the winding-up of the society including the costs of all the appeals to this House, and in the second place of the debts of the creditors of the said society, other than persons having advanced moneys to the society, the assets of the society should be applied in payment of all persons having advanced on loans to the said society, or the trustees or directors thereof, whose claims remain unsatisfied, in full, if the assets are sufficient, or if not, of a dividend pari passu and pro rata. The surplus, if any, should be applied in payment of the amounts due to those members of the society who are represented by the claimant Scott; in full if there be sufficient, if not, in payment of a dividend pari passu and rateably, in priority to the members who are not holders of deposit or paid-up shares, and the residue, if any, to the other shareholders." With that declaration (which includes a provision for the costs of all three appeals) these cases should be remitted to the court below.

I LORD BLACKBURN stated the facts, and continued: I have come to the conclusion that the orders made in the two cases of Brimelow v. Murray and Agnew v. Murray ought to be varied in the manner which the Lord Chancellor has stated, and that the order in Murray v. Scott is right, and should be affirmed, subject to the effect of the variation in the other orders, which will produce a great practical difference in the result.

The Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine, in his judgment says:

"Rule 32 of the rules [of the society] confers upon the trustees or directors thereof a power to borrow money without any limit or restriction as to amount, but in my judgment this power, being without a limit, is bad, and indeed this was almost admitted in the argument, and the point is covered by LORD HATHERLEY's judgment in Laing v. Reed (1), and other cases." A

He does not by name cite any other case than Laing v. Reed (1), but evidently thought there were others. In the Court of Appeal SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Calvert's Case, says (23 Ch.D. at p. 450):

"This is a building society with a rule which empowered the governing body of the society to borrow unlimited sums of money. This rule has been certified and been acted upon to a very considerable extent. But it is now well settled by the law that in such a society as this an unlimited power to borrow is not authorised, and that consequently such borrowing is beyond the powers of the society. Still all has been done here perfectly bona fide. The persons who made the rule, as well as those who acted upon it by borrowing and lending, all acted under a common mistake in law that that was a lawful rule, and was binding on the society." B C

He proceeds to state that on the winding-up it appeared that a large part of what formed the assets of the society was derived from money

"obtained in some shape or other from people who lent their money either without security or on equitable deposits or mortgages of property to the society, and the present respondent is one of those persons. Such borrowing from her was unauthorised, and consequently her loan to the society did not create either a legal or an equitable debt from the society to her." D

COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ., concurred.

It appears from the report that the counsel who argued for the then respondent before the Court of Appeal, as well as those before the Vice-Chancellor did not, at least strenuously, deny that the rule was ultra vires, apparently relying more upon other grounds. But the very learned judges were not passive instruments in the hands of the counsel, and, even if it had been admitted, certainly would not have given this judgment unless they had believed that it was settled that, though according to Laing v. Reed (1), the authority of which was not impeached, and which indeed was binding on the Court of Appeal, though not on this House, a rule similar to that in question if it contained a limit as to the amount to be borrowed was good, yet that a rule not containing such a limit as to amount was ultra vires. Counsel not having urged the point may account for SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., not entering into the reasons further than saying it "was well settled"; but that does not deprive the present respondent of the benefit of the fact that the judges in the Court of Appeal, two of whom, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and COTTON, L.J., had had as much experience in this branch of the law as anyone, and certainly much more than I can pretend to, thought it well settled. I for a time thought it probable that there were some decisions not known to me which supported their opinion. The research of counsel has produced all the authorities known to them, and my own research and the inquiry which I have made of the surviving members of the Court of Appeal lead me to the conclusion that the whole of the authorities—certainly all the reported cases—have been brought before the House. E F G

I will first, before going to the cases, consider the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. It begins with a preamble, H

"Whereas certain societies commonly called building societies have been established in different parts of the kingdom, principally among the industrious classes, for the purpose of raising by small periodical subscriptions a fund to assist the members thereof in obtaining a small freehold or leasehold property, and it is expedient to afford encouragement and protection to such societies, and the property obtained therewith." I

I think it material to see what authority, if any, to borrow would be given to the managers of such a society at common law, and then to consider the language of the Act. The statute 6 Geo. 1, c. 18, s. 18, commonly called the Bubble Act, had

A been repealed by 6 Geo. 4, c. 91, and from that time I know of nothing to render it illegal for any number of persons to agree together that each would take a share of a specified amount on which he should bind himself to the others, or to a trustee for the others, to make small periodical payments till the whole was paid up, and to do this for any legal purpose such as the purpose of raising a fund to be applied for the object recited in this preamble, each member as between himself and
B the other members being liable only to the extent of his share, and as between themselves only liable to pay at the time and in the manner stipulated.

In LINDLEY ON PARTNERSHIP (1st edn.), p. 152, after examining the authorities, the author arrives at the conclusion, in which I agree, that the legality at common law of societies not otherwise objectionable than because the members held shares may be considered as finally established. There might probably be practical difficulty in carrying on such a society with safety, or perhaps at all, without the aid of a statute. In order to apply the fund for the purpose indicated in the preamble to the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, the shareholders must employ somebody (whether directors or paid agents not members) to transact the necessary business, and, as some expense must be incurred for these purposes, in conformity with the maxim quando aliquid mandatur, mandatur et omne per quod pervenitur
C ad illud, the members who gave the agents authority to incur that expense were liable as their principals, and unless either some statute or the bargain made with the persons to whom the liability was incurred confined their recourse to the funds of the society inclusive of the amounts which the society could enforce against the shareholders, those members would be liable personally to the full extent of all their means. The amount of such liabilities to outside creditors would, however,
D generally be small.

In the present case, while the whole of the liabilities of the society exceeds £80,000, the liability to the outside creditors is little more than £200. But it is not necessary for the purpose of managing such a fund to borrow money, and the managers, therefore, would not merely as such have authority to borrow. The members might, if they pleased, authorise them to do so, so as to charge not only
F the funds of the society, but also their individual responsibility. It would be very injudicious to do so, but they might do it. I do not think that even before Cox v. Hickman (2) it could have been held that they became partners, and so necessarily gave the authority. They might also (I am still speaking of matters as they were before the statute was passed) authorise the managers to borrow money from those who were willing to lend it, on the terms that the lenders should
G have a charge on the funds of the society, and on the unpaid subscriptions of the shareholders, but should have no recourse against the members further than the society or its trustee had recourse against them, yet give them no authority to borrow on any other terms. I see nothing to prevent such a bargain being good, though I do see that practically there would be great risk, in the absence of a statute, of not being able to establish that the loans were made on those terms.

H After reciting the preamble to which I have referred the legislature proceed to enable any number of persons to form such societies (which I think they could do at common law), and to make rules "so as such rules shall not be repugnant to the express provisions of this Act, and to the general laws of the realm." And they provide that such rules should be certified and registered, so that all who dealt with the society might see what the rules actually were, and I
I think that those who dealt with the society could not say that any authority beyond what would be implied from the management of the fund was given, unless it was given by the rules which they ought to have examined. This removed one great practical difficulty in the way of working such societies. There is no provision in the statute that I can find that prevents the members of such a society from being personally liable to anyone who had a debt exigible from the society, but if the debt was contracted under a rule which required that the debt should only be contracted on the terms that the funds of the society should be liable, and not the persons of the members, the liability would be so limited. Whether any particular rule did so limit the responsibility or not was a question which must have depended upon the construction of the rule. The statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 was not artificially drawn. It is obvious that those who promoted it were influenced mainly by a wish to help the industrious classes to obtain dwelling-houses or small plots of land, and probably supposed that by limiting the maximum of a share to £150 they had secured that the shareholders should use the society only for the purpose of obtaining mortgages not above the value of £150. It was very soon found out that there was nothing to prevent a person who wished as a speculative builder to borrow £15,000 from taking 100 shares if he could find a society willing to lend so much on mortgage. Societies were formed and registered under the Act as building societies on a very large scale. In some of those, rules were framed more or less resembling r. 32 in the present case, under which the managers acted as those of this society have done. In others, without any rule to authorise or purporting to authorise it, the managers of the society acted in the same way.

After a protracted parliamentary inquiry the Building Societies Act, 1874, was passed, repealing the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, but by s. 8, amended by the Act of 1875, saving the existing societies unless they registered under the new Act, which the present society has not done. In 1857 SIR RICHARD BETHELL [afterwards LORD WESTBURY] when Attorney-General, gave an opinion for the guidance of the certifying barrister which I take from the report in the Parliamentary Papers 1869, No. 399, p. 121. It was as follows:

"I am of opinion that a rule authorising the raising of money for the purpose of the society would be repugnant to the fundamental principles of the society, and that it cannot be certified as a rule in conformity with law and with the provisions of the statute."

This opinion was questioned, and in 1869 a bill was filed by William Heron Laing, a member of the Northern Counties Permanent Building Society, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders of the society (except the defendants), against the trustees of that society, for an injunction to restrain them from acting on r. 18 of that society, which had been, it was admitted on the bill, duly certified by MR. TIDD PRATT as long ago as 1851.

The rule is set out at length in the report of Laing v. Reed (1) in 39 L.J.Ch. at p. 2, thus:

"XVIII.—1. That the trustees for the time being may from time to time, as occasion shall require, borrow and take up at interest any sum of money from any banker with whom the funds of this society shall be deposited, or from any other person, to procure which the trustees may give their own personal security, and they shall be indemnified out of the first funds of this society which shall be received. 2. That the parties lending money to the trustees of this society pursuant to the provisions herein contained shall be allowed interest for the same at the rate of and not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, such interest to be payable half-yearly or otherwise, as may be agreed upon, and that all loans shall be repayable to the lender by giving twenty-eight days' notice, on any monthly meeting night of the society. 3. That for securing the repayment to the person or persons advancing the same, of all moneys to be borrowed by the trustees on behalf of the society as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for them the said trustees to give, or authorise to be given, such form of security as may be legal and as the trustees shall think proper and necessary for and in respect of the same. 4. That no trustee (unless by his consent expressly signified in writing on the security to be given to any lender) shall become responsible for any sum or sums of money so borrowed as aforesaid. 5. That the total sum of money to be borrowed under this rule shall not at any one time exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured by the mortgages to the society, including the mortgage or mortgages for which such advance or advances may be required."

- A In the report in the LAW REPORTS, 5 Ch. App. 4, the rule is very much abridged, and I think the abridgment has misled many persons (including MALINS, V.-C., in a case which I shall presently refer to) as to what the legal effect of the rule was, and consequently as to what was the actual decision of the Court of Appeal in Laing v. Reed (1), and, perhaps, though I say this with less certainty, as to what LORD HATHERLEY meant in a part of what he is reported as saying. The rule seems
- B to me to limit the recourse of the lenders to the funds of the society and the securities actually given under para. 3, and to exclude the previous liability of any member, except of those who had given as lenders their personal security. I should have said this even if para. 1 stood alone, but when para. 4 is read with it I think it is quite clear. Paragraph 5 adds a limitation, not as to who should be liable, but as to the amount to be borrowed.
- C The rule now in question, 32, as I construe it, does not contain any power to borrow on the security of the members, that given being only to make the moneys borrowed a first charge on the society's funds and property, and, therefore, so far is, I think, identical with that of Laing v. Reed (1). But there is no limitation on the amount to be borrowed, and in that respect the rule now in question differs from that which in Laing v. Reed (1) was held valid. The bill was demurred to
- D avowedly for the purpose of raising the question whether the rule was, as SIR RICHARD BETHELL had advised, repugnant and void or not. MALINS, V.-C., refused to decide this question on demurrer. There was an appeal before LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., and GIFFARD, L.J. The judgments were verbal. Conciseness was not among the many merits of LORD HATHERLEY. The report in the LAW JOURNAL was probably abridged, that in the LAW REPORTS is evidently much abridged. After stating
- E that he thought that the demurrer was a proper mode of raising the question of law, he proceeds (I quote from the report in the LAW JOURNAL) to say (39 L.J.Ch. at pp. 6, 7):

- "If the law prohibits the raising of such sums of money, no certificate of the barrister could make it any better. But does the Act of Parliament in effect
- F prevent or forbid any such arrangement being made as has here been made? If the rule had been a rule by which the society were authorised through the medium of its trustees to raise an unlimited sum of money, wholly regardless of the contributions made by the members, the effect would be plainly contrary to the spirit of the Act. . . . In substance it comes to this: so far from being contrary to anything in the Act it is simply a regulation by which they say,
- G We are desirous of making available for the objects of the Act (that is admitted by the bill), for the purpose of purchasing freehold lands, our contributions and fines and other payments in the best possible manner for us all; and to say that will injure one or other when the company is framing its rules is nothing to the purpose—they are the best judges of that. The whole body form the rules,
- H each judges for himself, and they carry the rules by a majority, and submit them to the barrister."

I think these expressions, which are left out in the abbreviated report in the LAW REPORTS, throw some light on what LORD HATHERLEY was thinking of when he spoke of raising an unlimited sum of money "wholly regardless of the contributions made by the members."

- I GIFFARD, L.J.'s judgment is much the same in both reports. SIR RICHARD BETHELL's opinion had been cited in the argument, and GIFFARD, L.J., evidently had its terms in his mind when he explains what he thinks would be "repugnancy" to the Act, viz., a rule making the society a society different from that specified in the Act. I do not find a word in his judgment to indicate that he relied on the limit of the amount contained in para. 5. The decision, which has never been reversed or even questioned, was that that particular rule, which, as I construe it, confined the recourse of the lenders to the personal security of such trustees as by express writing made themselves responsible, who were to be indemnified out of the first funds of the society and to the securities which might be given to the lenders. A and which also limited the amount to be borrowed, was valid.

This decision was on Nov. 4, 1869. On Dec. 17, 1869, GIFFARD, L.J., pronounced judgment in Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society, Ex parte Williamson (3), and there he says (5 Ch. App. at p. 312):

"The matter itself is a very simple one. This company is what is called a benefit building society. Until the recent decision of the court in Laing v. Reed (1), it was doubted whether, even if you put a limited borrowing power among the rules of a society of this sort, that particular rule would be legal. But what we have here is a limited benefit building society, without any power to borrow, and the rules and very nature of that society show that it would be contrary to its constitution to borrow money so as to bind the company or to make the individual members of the company, as members, liable for borrowing money, because the whole constitution of the society is that the members are to make certain monthly payments, and in consideration of these monthly payments and the fines provided by the rules, they are to receive certain loans."

What is here decided is that a society under this Act has no power to borrow unless its rules authorise it so to do, and that is, I think, as well settled to be law as anything not yet decided by this House can be. D

I do not think that the actual decision in Laing v. Reed (1) ought to be put higher than that a rule which authorised borrowing, but was so expressed as on its construction not to make the members as such liable for the money borrowed, and which also had a limit as to the sum to be borrowed, was valid. It left it open to anyone to say that, had not both these limits existed, non constat that the decision would not have been different. I think also that the language of LORD HATHERLEY is such that it might fairly be argued that LORD HATHERLEY attached weight to the limit as to amount contained in para. 5 of the rule. I do not think that could be said of GIFFARD, L.J. The legislature in the Act of 1874, by s. 14, expressly limited the liability of members, as such, in societies under that Act, in all cases. And in s. 15, while by sub-s. (1) authorising borrowing, and thereby showing that the legislature did not think it expedient to adopt SIR RICHARD BETHELL's opinion that all borrowing was repugnant to the fundamental principle of such a society, they did also by sub-s. (2) show that they thought it expedient at least to put a limit on the amount to be borrowed. But though such limit as to the amount which the trustees are authorised to borrow is obviously highly expedient, I do not see how such a limitation on the amount can on any principle be said to affect the question whether the borrowing is repugnant to the principles of the society. As counsel for the appellants Brimelow and Agnew forcibly put it in his argument, whether there should be a limit on the amount is a question not of principle but of expediency. If all borrowing power is repugnant to the fundamental principle of the society, it cannot be that a power to borrow a sum limited in amount is not repugnant. E
H

But though this is my opinion, it certainly was not that of MALINS, V.-C. In March, 1870, Hill's Case (4), came before MALINS, V.-C. There had been a set of rules certified by the barrister, among which had been a rule empowering the directors to borrow money, but on the revision of those rules in 1861 that rule was, in consequence of the opinion of SIR RICHARD BETHELL, struck out. The rules subsequent to 1861 contained no power to borrow. The revision of the rules had been apparently conducted in a somewhat slovenly manner, and r. 19, as certified in 1861, contained language that alluded to the rule previously struck out. The Vice-Chancellor said that it did not give any power to borrow at all. That being so, all that it was necessary to decide was that there was no power to borrow, so that members were not liable as individuals to pay calls made in the winding-up for the purpose of paying the lenders, and that was apparently all that the Vice-Chancellor did decide. But though it was quite unnecessary, in a case where there was no such rule, to say anything about the validity or invalidity of a rule giving I

A a borrowing power, the Vice-Chancellor did give a judgment on that question, expressing his dissent from Laing v. Reed (1), which, even if wrong, was binding on him, and, to my mind, his reasoning is unsatisfactory. Yet it is upon this altogether unnecessary opinion, and, as far as I can discover, upon this alone, that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., must have acted when he said that it was settled.

B MALINS, V.-C., assumes, without giving any reasons for it, that a rule giving a power to borrow, if valid at all, must give a power so as to enable those who borrowed to pledge the credit of the members as individuals. Whether a rule which authorised the managers to pledge the members as individuals was ever certified or not I do not know; it certainly would be eminently inexpedient that there should be such a power. Whether, if such a rule existed, it would be valid is a question which has never, as far as I can find, been raised; it certainly was not raised in Laing v. Reed (1). I think there is ground for saying that LORD HATHERLEY meant to say that a power to raise money on the security of the individual members, irrespective of the amount of their contributions, would, in his opinion, be repugnant to the objects of the Act. I am by no means prepared to decide that question either way until it arises, which it never has hitherto, and certainly does not in the present case. But a rule giving power to borrow from D those who were willing to accept as their only security the funds of the society, including the contributions which members might as such pay to the society, and the personal liability of such persons as chose to pledge their personal liability, stands on a very different footing. The Vice-Chancellor does not seem to have perceived that there might be such a distinction, and certainly not to have perceived that such a distinction did exist in the rule in Laing v. Reed (1).

E The only other case of those brought before your Lordships' notice which I think it necessary to refer to is Re Professional, Commercial, and Industrial Benefit Building Society (5) in 1871. The language of JAMES, L.J., has been cited as showing that he was under the impression that Laing v. Reed (1) was to be understood in the limited sense put upon it by MALINS, V.-C., in Hill's Case (4), and though it is clear that no such point needed to be decided by JAMES, L.J., I think F that any opinion which he expresses on such a point is worthy of great attention. There had been an additional rule made in March, 1870, which on inquiry at the registrar's office it appears was duly certified, though the expressions attributed to JAMES, L.J., had made that seem doubtful. That rule was in terms not substantially differing from the first paragraph of r. 18 in Laing v. Reed (1). It did not contain anything equivalent to para. 5. The question to be decided was, whether G the society should be wound-up on the petition of persons who, if it was wound-up, would, or at least might be, contributories, but who certainly were not creditors. JAMES, L.J., is reported to have said (6 Ch. App. at p. 861): "Then the petitioners say: We have a strict right to an order, we are contributories." The lord justice points out that no statutable proof of inability to pay its debts was given against the society, and proceeds (ibid.):

H "Nor has the insolvency been proved otherwise to the satisfaction of the court. It has not been proved to my satisfaction that there is any debt whatever in respect of which the society could be liable. First of all, a society of this kind is not entitled to borrow money except under a particular rule. It is no part of its business to borrow money. It may incur debts, no doubt, to a certain extent: it must, for instance, incur office rent and employ a solicitor and a secretary, and to that extent probably there is always some small amount of debt which everybody of this kind must incur. But beyond this it is very I difficult to see what debts it could legally incur."

So far, what he says is in exact conformity with what I have endeavoured to state as my view of the law, but he goes on (ibid.):

"But it appears that the society having gone on receiving deposits from persons other than members, and having incurred a debt to its bankers, passed a resolution authorising the trustees to borrow money for the purposes of the society.

I am of opinion that, in accordance with the decided cases that resolution was expressed in terms far too wide to make it a valid or binding resolution, and therefore there never was any debt which the society, qua society, could be sued upon."

Speaking as he was on Aug. 1, 1871, the decided cases can only have been Laing v. Reed (1), Ex parte Williamson (3), and Hill's Case (4). He proceeds to point out that to some extent at least they might come on the funds of the society. MELLISH, L.J., is far more cautious. He says (ibid. at p. 864):

"Then, as respects their liability [their individual liability as contributors to make good the loans], I agree with the lord justice that in all probability they were never liable to anything, but, even if they were liable, all the alleged creditors of the society have joined in a release, and I have no doubt that that release is an effectual protection."

Though JAMES, L.J., had not any need to decide this, and may not have put his mind to this point, he does, I think, intimate that his impression was that the rule not limiting the amount of money to be borrowed, was, according to Laing v. Reed (1), not valid. I have already expressed my reasons for coming to a different conclusion, but I think JAMES, L.J.'s expressions are an authority against me. I do not think, however, it can in any possible view of it be held to settle the law. If the rest of the noble and learned Lords agree with me in thinking that a rule authorising borrowing so as to charge the funds of the society, but not the persons of the members, is valid, though there is no limit such as that in para. 5 of the rule in Laing v. Reed (1), it is necessary to decide whether the specific securities pledged to the lenders can be made available. That, I think, is a question depending on the construction of the rule. If there had been an express clause enabling them to mortgage specifically property of the society (and perhaps one similar to para. 3 of the rule in Laing v. Reed (1) might be so construed), I think that the reasoning I have submitted to the House leads to the conclusion that the specific pledges would be good; and the same would perhaps follow if such a power to pledge specific property was implied. But there is certainly no express power to pledge given, and I think that the terms of the rule, which make all the loans a first charge on the funds, which would lead the lenders to believe that in the event of a winding-up at least they would all come in pari passu, are quite sufficient to negative an implied power to mortgage, even if such a power could be implied from a power to borrow. I do not, however, think there is any ground for such an implication, even if this did not negative it. Murray v. Scott, I think, was rightly decided by the Court of Appeal. I am relieved from any necessity for saying more about it than that I quite agree in the reasons given by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. The result is, that I agree in the proposed judgment.

LORD WATSON.—The questions brought before the House in these appeals have been so fully and exhaustively treated by my noble and learned friends that I shall content myself with indicating some of the considerations which have induced me to concur in the judgment which has been moved.

One of the most important of these questions relates to the validity of r. 32, which gives the directors power, from time to time as occasion may require, to borrow money from the society's banker, or from any other banker or person. In both the courts below it was assumed to be settled law that the rule was invalid because it does not impose any limit upon the amount which the directors are authorised to borrow. It cannot with strict accuracy be said that the power conferred is absolutely without limit, seeing that it is only to be exercised "as occasion may require," which plainly implies that it is not to be exercised at all except in the case of a loan being required for the purposes of the society in the course of its legitimate transactions as a benefit building society. It is obvious, however, that the kind of limit which was assumed to be necessary in order to validate the rule was that indicated by LORD HATHERLEY in Laing v. Reed (1),

A viz., a pecuniary limit proportionate to the trading capital of the society derived from the contributions of its members.

I agree with your Lordships that there is nothing in the provisions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, which either expressly prohibits or can by reasonable implication be held to disable the members of a benefit building society, whose constitution and powers are still regulated by that Act, from authorising their directors to borrow money, although in the absence of such authority the directors would not have that power. Upon this point Laing v. Reed (1), and the cases which followed it, to which I need not specially refer, are all direct precedents, and so far I do not doubt that they were well decided. But it was contended at your Lordships' Bar, and the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine, as well as the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, seem to have thought, that these cases form a series of decisions to the effect that any authority to borrow given by the members to their directors is wholly void unless it be qualified by a limitation of the amount to be borrowed such as I have described. An examination of these cases, all of which have been already noticed by LORD BLACKBURN, satisfies me that in none of them was the present question as to the validity or invalidity of that which has been termed an unlimited power to borrow raised and decided. The doctrine that such a power is ultra vires of the society, and, therefore, void, had its origin in the opinion of LORD HATHERLEY in Laing v. Reed (1), an opinion which was referred to as authoritative in subsequent cases, although the point did not then arise for judicial determination. In Laing v. Reed (1) the sum authorised to be borrowed was restricted to two-thirds of the total amount for the time being secured to the society by mortgage, so that there was no question before the court as to the legality of an unlimited power. But it certainly appears to me that LORD HATHERLEY in that case sustained the power on the express ground that it was limited as to amount, and that the limit was proportioned to that part of its contributed capital which the society had advanced to its members, or lent on mortgage, and I think the noble and learned Lord did intend to lay down the law to the effect that without some limitation of that character the power would have been invalid.

F I prefer the test of its legality applied by GIFFARD, L.J., to the rule which he had to consider along with LORD HATHERLEY in Laing v. Reed (1):

"Does this rule merely provide a method of conducting business, or is it a rule making the society a thing different from a benefit building society?"

G The legality of such a rule appears to me to depend upon the natural and probable results of the due exercise of the power which it confers, and not upon the consequences of its possible abuse by unscrupulous or fraudulent directors. It is quite conceivable that a benefit building society might find legitimate uses for borrowed money to an amount exceeding two-thirds of its contributed capital, and it is also conceivable that a power to take on loan not more than two-thirds might be abused, and the money embarked in transactions foreign to the legitimate business of the society. No power the exercise of which will necessarily or naturally involve a violation of the statutory constitution of the society can be sustained as valid by a court of law; but, on the other hand, it appears to me to be beyond the functions of the court to lay down a hard and fast rule, dictated by considerations of expediency, which may give some societies more latitude than they require, and may restrict the legitimate business of others.

I I am, accordingly, of opinion that r. 32 is unexceptionable. As I read the rule it merely empowers the directors to raise money by way of loan when that becomes necessary for the purpose of carrying on the proper business of the society, and it does not appear to me to admit of serious dispute that the sums actually borrowed by the directors, though of large amount, were exclusively employed by them for that purpose. There is another question, attended with much nicety, and of great importance to some of the litigants, which relates to the right of those creditors who lent money to the society upon the faith of specific securities. What would have been the precise rights of those creditors if r. 32 had not contained the declaration that "any borrowed money shall be a first charge on the funds and property of the society." or if there had been added to the rule the further declaration that it should be lawful for the directors to give lenders such form of security as might be legal, and as the directors might deem proper, are questions which I do not think it necessary for the purposes of the present case to determine. The rules of this society do not give, at any rate they do not expressly give, authority to the directors to borrow on mortgage, and the declaration in r. 32 appears to me to be so expressed as to qualify the power of the directors, and to fix the security which is to be given alike to all lenders to the society. As the rule stands it conveys an intimation to lenders that all loans are to constitute a first charge upon the assets of the society, and it would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with any reasonable construction of the rule to hold that the directors were thereby authorised in the first place to borrow largely on the faith of that intimation, and then to make over the whole property and funds available for payment of these loans in pledge to preferable creditors. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that lenders holding specific securities must nevertheless come in pari passu with unsecured creditors who have advanced money to the society in reliance upon r. 32.

Shipping—Collision—Damages—Both vessels to blame—Division of loss—Ship suffering greater damage to receive half damages in respect thereof less half the damages in respect of the damage sustained by other vessel.

Two ships, the V. and the K., were damaged in a collision for which in an action brought in the Admiralty Division they were found both to blame. The V. had sustained the greater amount of the damage, and the owners of the K. paid the amount of their liability into court. In an action by the owners of the K. to limit their liability, Held (LORD BRAMWELL, dissenting): the owners of the V. were entitled to prove against the fund in court for a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the K., and to be paid in respect of the balance due to them after such deduction pari passu with the other claimants out of the fund.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal.

The action was brought by the respondent company, the owners of the steamship Khediye, to limit their liability in respect of the damage arising out of a collision between that vessel and the steamship Voorwards, belonging to the appellant company, which took place in May, 1878. In Stoomvaart Maatschappij Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. (5 App. Cas. 876) the House of Lords held that both vessels were to blame, and in accordance with the Admiralty rule each was condemned to pay the moiety of the other's damage. This action was brought by the owners of the Khedive to limit their liability under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, s. 54 [see now Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 503]. The owners of the Khedive paid the amount of their liability into court. The owners of the Voorwarts, which had sustained the greater amount of damage, contended that they were entitled to set off the moiety of the damage sustained by the Khedive, and to prove against the fund in court for the balance; but the contention on the other side was that they should prove for the whole moiety of the loss sustained by them, and be paid in respect of such moiety pari passu with the other claimants on the fund.

Butt, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C., and Myburgh, Q.C., for the respondents.

July 26, 1882. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—This case has been to me one of unusual difficulty. In the courts below judicial opinion has been equally divided, and I fear that, even in your Lordships' House, there is not unanimity. In most cases the argument from abstract justice and equity is (in re dubia) of great importance; but here it seems to me that there is little, if any, room for that argument. Whatever in this case was the liability to damages within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, to that liability the statutory limitation must be applied. That liability depends upon a rule of the Admiralty jurisdiction, which to myself has always seemed arbitrary; and in examining the practice and procedure of the Court of Admiralty, in order to ascertain the true results of that rule, we not only enter upon a branch of forensic jurisprudence, the forms of which are different from those of the common law courts (in which other questions of liability to damage usually arose), but we find important variations in those forms themselves.

The rule was thus stated by SIR WILLIAM SCOTT, in The Lord Melville (1):

"When it [i.e., loss by collision at sea] happened by the common fault of both parties, the ancient rule of the Admiralty was, that it should be considered a common loss, to which both parties were liable."

In The Woodrop-Sims (2) the same very learned judge said:

"The rule is that the loss must be apportioned [meaning equally apportioned] between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them."

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, [repealed by Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, of which see s. 503 (1) (ii) as amended by the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958], provides that in all cases of collision, where there is no loss of life or personal injury (no special reference being made in the Act to the particular case of both ships being in fault), the owners of any ship "shall not be answerable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things" to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the ship's tonnage. This is a limitation of the amount for which the owner shall be "answerable in damages;" it does not make him, in any case, "answerable in damages" upon any principle or to any extent upon or to which he would not have been so "answerable" if the Act had not passed. Nor does it relieve him, wholly or partially, from any loss to which he might have been subject, otherwise than by liability in damages. If, for instance, his whole ship were wholly lost in a collision, for which it was alone to blame, he must bear that whole loss, in addition to his liability in damages, as limited by the statute, to the owners of the other ship, and also to the owners of any cargo. And, if the true result of the Admiralty rule is, as the Master of the Rolls and BRETT, L.J., considered it to be, that in a case in which both ships are to blame only one of them is really liable in damages to the other, such damages representing a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss, beyond the point at which the one loss balances the other, the fact that the rest

A of the loss must be borne by each shipowner who has suffered it is quite consistent with the limitation of liability by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act.

The question is whether there are in these cases two cross liabilities in damages of each shipowner to the other for half the loss which that other has sustained, or only one liability for a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss beyond the point of equality. If both parties were solvent, and if there were no statutory limit of liability, the result either way would practically be the same; because up to the point of equality the loss would be borne, in the one view, by the owner who suffered it, and, in the other view, the one liability would be compensated by, or set off against, the other, according to an equity which would certainly have been enforced in the Court of Admiralty. If, however, by the effect of a supervening bankruptcy before judgment, or of the statutory limitation of liability, the position of the two parties were rendered unequal, so that a claim by the one would only be to receive a dividend out of a fund, while a claim by the other would be payable in full, the distinction may become important. But a consequence arising out of circumstances foreign to the rule itself ought not to be regarded in the determination of this question, whether it may tend practically to disturb or to maintain that equality of participation in the loss arising from a common fault, which is the principle of the Admiralty rule.

The solution of this question appears to me to depend upon the true effect of the procedure, and the forms of decrees of the Admiralty Court in this class of cases; for the new method of procedure under the Judicature Acts, by claim and counter-claim, cannot, in my opinion, make any difference. If the course of the court had been to deal with the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships in a single proceeding, the natural result of the rule would, I think, certainly be that for which the appellants contend. If both ships had suffered an exactly equal amount of damage, ascertained in the same suit, it cannot be conceived that the court, acting on such a rule, would adjudge the owner of the one ship to pay any damages at all to the other. In general, this would not happen, but one ship would have suffered more damage than the other. The natural result of this inequality of loss would seem to be not that either owner should pay anything to the other up to the point at which (if there had been no such difference) the loss would have been equal, but that the difference only should be equally divided between them, the one bearing and the other paying a moiety of that difference.

The whole difficulty, as it seems to me, arises out of the fact that the course of the Court of Admiralty was not, and, from the nature of the case, hardly could have been, to deal with the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships in a single suit. When a suit for collision was brought it was always by one party alleging the other party to be in fault; and there was also generally (when both were ultimately found to blame, and when both had sustained damage) a cross suit by the other party, with a like allegation of fault against his opponent. At the hearing, whether of one such suit only, or of two such suits, heard separately, or conjoined, the court, when it determined that both ships were to blame, usually pronounced in each suit a separate decree. It cannot be denied that the more common and recent form of such decrees seems (prima facie, at all events) favourable to the contention of the respondents. In each suit there was, as I have said, a separate decree declaring that both ships were in fault, "and that the damage arising therefrom ought to be borne equally" by the owners of both ships; and afterwards proceeding to "condemn" the defendants and their bail "in a moiety of the damages proceeded for by the plaintiffs;" and referring it to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount of such damages (with or without costs, as the court might think fit). Under every such decree the registrar made a report, finding that a moiety of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs amounted to so much, and (ordinarily) computing interest thereon from the date of the decree. A moiety of the damages sustained by the other party (if plaintiff in a cross suit) was in like manner found (also with interest) sometimes by the same, and sometimes by a separate report. It does not appear that, on the face of the reports made under this form of decree, any balance was ever struck; but, unless the parties, by a voluntary settlement, rendered further resort to the court unnecessary, the proper course would have been for that plaintiff to whom a balance was due to apply to the court for a monition requiring the other party to pay it. A monition was seldom issued in practice: indeed, counsel in his argument for the respondents stated that he had been unable to find one on the records of the court. But there cannot, I think, be any doubt that, if issued, it would have been in favour of one plaintiff only and that for the balance, representing one moiety of the excess of the aggregate loss beyond equality, and the interest thereon, and the costs (if any) to which that plaintiff might be entitled. B

The computation of interest by the registrars in cases of this class might, at first sight, seem to imply that there was, in that stage, an ascertained judgment debt carrying interest. But I think this cannot be a correct view, whatever (in other respects) may be the effect of the decrees under which the registrars acted. C It does not appear to have been the general course of the court that those decrees should contain any direction as to interest; and I think it more probable that the principle on which interest was computed under them is that mentioned by Mr. SEDGWICK in his book on DAMAGES (chap. 15, pp. 373 and 385-7), where he treats of the power of a jury to allow interest as in the nature of damages, for the detention of money or property improperly withheld, or to punish negligent, tortious, or fraudulent conduct, or the destruction of or injury to property involving the loss of any profit which might have been made by its use or employment. I understand the Master of the Rolls and BRETT, L.J., to have been of opinion that everything in this course of procedure, prior to monition, was not in form only (according to the style of the Admiralty Courts), but substantially interlocutory; that the decree was not, either before or after the report of the registrar, equivalent to a final judgment constituting a liability in a certain amount of liquidated damages; that, for this purpose, a monition (which, both in form and in substance, would be an order to pay) was necessary; that such monition could only issue for a moiety of the excess of the aggregate loss beyond the point of equality, in conformity with the principle of the rule declared on the face of the decree itself; and that there was, therefore, no liability in damages except for that balance. D

BAGGALLAY and CORRON, L.JJ., on the other hand, thought that the amount of the liability of each party to pay damages to the other was fixed by the decree in the suit of each plaintiff, and that the monition was merely a step towards execution. E

If no light could be obtained from any other source than the analogy of the forms of procedure in courts of common law and equity, I should have found great difficulty in dissenting from the conclusions of BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.JJ. G But, in determining the effect of Admiralty procedure, authorities in the Admiralty Court ought to prevail over reasoning founded upon the procedure of other tribunals. I referred in the outset to the terms in which the "ancient rule of the Admiralty" was stated by Sir William Scott in The Lord Melville (1); and I recur to them for the purpose of observing that they would hardly seem to be quite accurate if the loss to be "apportioned" (according to the other form of expression used by him) were only that of one ship considered separately and without regard to the loss of the other. H At all events, the phrase "a common loss" seems to me to point, more naturally, to what LORD DENMAN, C.J., understood to be the result of the Admiralty rule. In De Vaux v. Salvador (3), he said (4 Ad. & El. at p. 431)

"... a positive rule of the Court of Admiralty requires the damage done to both ships to be added together, and the combined amount to be equally divided between the owners of the two." I

The observation which I have ventured to make upon Sir William Scott's words is, in itself, slight, and would be of no weight at all if there were no precedents of the Court of Admiralty in accordance with LORD DENMAN's statement of the rule. But there do appear to be such precedents, older than the forms recently in use, and differing from them. Whatever else may be doubtful in this case, it is, at all

A events, certain that the ancient rule of the Admiralty and the present rule are the same. The earliest recorded precedent is that of The Petersfield v. The Judith Randolph (4), decided by SIR JAMES MARRIOTT in 1789 (following, as it would seem, a case determined in Queen Anne's time), which was treated by LORD GIFFORD when delivering the opinion of this House in Hay v. Le Neve (5) as an authority for the application of the Admiralty rule, which the House of Lords ought to follow. In

B Hay v. Le Neve (5) the question which is now so important did not arise, because there only one of the ships which came into collision had sustained any damage. But a decision, so recognised by this House, is entitled to great weight on all points relating either to the principle or to the application of the rule.

The exact terms of the final judgment entered up in The Petersfield v. The Judith Randolph (4) were thus stated to the House of Lords by LORD GIFFORD :

C "The judge by his interlocutory decree pronounced, that both ships were in fault, and that the Judith Randolph was most in fault, and decreed that the whole damage sustained by the owners of the ship Petersfield and her cargo, which was sunk and lost, as well as the £230 damages and expenses given against the ship Petersfield, and the costs of suit here on both sides, be borne equally by the parties to this suit; and assigned for liquidation of damages and

D taxation of expenses the third session of next term; and referred the liquidation of the said damages and expenses to the registrar, taking to his assistance two merchants."

This form of decree agrees with LORD DENMAN's statement of the rule. Its effect is, I think, clear: £230 damages and expenses had been ascertained (I presume,

E in a suit brought by the owners of the Judith Randolph) as the amount of the loss and expenses suffered by the Judith Randolph, in a moiety of which (as I suppose) the Petersfield had been "condemned." But the amount of the loss and expenses suffered by the Petersfield was, as yet, unascertained. Let it be supposed, for illustration's sake, that, when ascertained, the loss and expenses suffered by the Petersfield and her cargo might amount to £1,770, which, added to £230,

F would make £2,000. This decree certainly could not and did not mean that the owners of the Petersfield and her cargo, who had suffered in damages and expenses £1,770, should be liable in £1,000 damages and costs to the owners of the Judith Randolph, whose total loss and expenses did not exceed £230, and should themselves be entitled to receive back from the owners of the Judith Randolph the exact amount which they so paid. The effect of that operation would

G simply be that the parties would be left in the same position as they would have been at common law, each bearing his own total loss. The effect of such a form of decree could, therefore, only be that the owners of the Petersfield and her cargo should bear their own greater loss to the extent of £1,000, and that the owners of the Judith Randolph, after bearing the whole amount of their smaller loss, namely, £230, should pay the residue of £1,000, being a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss, to the owners of the Petersfield. This is, in substance, that mode of

H applying the Admiralty rule for which the appellants here contend.

DR. LUSHINGTON appears to have followed this precedent in 1841, referring expressly to Hay v. Le Neve (5), in The Washington (6), when, two cross actions being tried by agreement at the same time, he "decreed the damages, costs, and expenses of both parties to be thrown together, and to be equally divided." It

I further appears to me that this view of the real meaning of the procedure in such cases goes far to reconcile with sound principle the course taken by DR. LUSHINGTON in The Seringapatam (7) (3 Wm. Rob. at p. 44) and The Tecla Carmen (8), which (in the former case especially) would otherwise have seemed arbitrary, and hardly consistent with the respect due to those decrees of Her Majesty in Council in favour of the owners of the Harriett and the Tecla Carmen, the fruits of which he thought himself entitled to withhold from the plaintiff, unless (in the one case) they would "submit to the deduction of a moiety of the damages which had been sustained by the owners of the Seringapatam" (without a decree in any cross suit), and (in the other) until a cross suit should be brought to hearing. These authorities are, I think, sufficient to prove that the course of the Court of Admiralty has been to use its powers over its own procedure, so as either at the hearing of a cross suit after decree and report in the original suit, or at the hearing of two conjoined suits, or in that later stage at which a monition might be applied for, to bring about the same result as if the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships had been, from the first, dealt with in one proceeding, and this, not by way of set-off, but in a manner which can only be explained as resulting from the view which that court took of the principle, and the just consequences, of its own rule.

One further observation I desire to make, as offering (what seems to me) a not improbable explanation of the ordinary form of decree. It is that, as every suit of this kind was originally brought by a plaintiff alleging his adversary to be in fault (and not admitting the existence of fault on both sides), and as each suit was or might be separately brought to a hearing, the form of the decree made separately in each suit, before "liquidation of damages," would naturally be such as might be applicable to the possible case (which actually occurred in Hay v. Le Neve (5)) of that plaintiff's ship only having suffered any damage; in which case the moiety of that damage only which was mentioned in that decree would be taken into account. My conclusion, upon the whole, is that the opinion of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and BRETT, L.J., ought to prevail, and that the judgment appealed from should be reversed. In arriving at this conclusion, I have not only the hesitation which I must always feel in differing from the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD BRAMWELL, but I am also bound to acknowledge that my own impression down to the conclusion of the arguments, had been different. A fuller consideration of the authorities to which I have referred has convinced me that they are not reconcilable with the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In this case two ships, the Voorwarts belonging to the appellants, and the Khedive belonging to the respondents, came into collision, and damage was thereby occasioned to each of the ships and to the cargo on board, so that the owners of each ship and the owners of the cargo each sustained loss arising from the same accident, and each had a claim for recompense from those who were responsible. No loss of life or personal injury was incurred. It was ultimately determined that the collision arose from the fault of both ships, and according to the rule in the Admiralty, that being so, the whole damage arising from the collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of the two ships, without inquiring in what degree each was to blame. There was no fault or privity on the part of the owners of the Khedive, and they were entitled to take steps for limiting their liability; and as the moiety of the damage in any view of the case exceeded the amount to which their liability was limited, they instituted an action for this purpose in the Admiralty Division, bringing that amount into court, and making the owners of the Voorwarts and all other persons claiming damages from the collision, defendants. The amount of the damage to the Voorwarts exceeded the damage to the Khedive, and the question which it is intended to raise is whether the owners of the Voorwarts were to prove for the whole moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them and to be paid in respect of such moiety pari passu with the other claimants on the fund, which is the contention of the respondents, or whether they were to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the Khedive.

One practical difference is that if the respondents are right the amount to be paid out of its fund in court to the owners of the cargo, who are not to blame, will be diminished, for the benefit of the Khedive which was to blame, and, as was said by BAGGALLAY, L.J., in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Co. (9)

"it certainly strikes one as improbable that such an apparently inequitable result should be in accordance with a true construction of the Merchant Shipping Acts; but, if such be their true construction, we are bound to adopt and act upon it, however inequitable the result may be."

A Perhaps it is too strong to call the result inequitable, but I think it is certainly one which the legislature were not likely to have wished to bring about, and that, if they had had it brought to their notice, they probably might have altered the language of the Acts, so as to make it clear that they did not intend to bring about such a result. Whether, on the true construction of the Acts as they are framed, the result follows is the question. Another result is that, as between the ship-owners, the ship which seeks to limit its liability will always, whether its damage be greater or less than the other, obtain a benefit; whether that is to be wished depends upon which was most to blame.

B This is in substance an appeal from the decision in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Co. (9), in which the question was decided, and it was so argued. In that case the Savernake and the Vesuvius had come into collision, and both were to blame. The owner of the Savernake brought the amount of his statutable liability into court, and made the owners of the Vesuvius and all other claimants defendants. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in that suit, declared

C "that the defendants, the Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Co., are entitled to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the Savernake, and to be paid in respect of such balance pari passu with the other claimants out of the fund in court."

D That is the declaration which the appellants say ought to be made here, and if it were made the rest of the order would easily be framed. But this declaration was altered in the Court of Appeal by a majority consisting of BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.JJ., BRETT, L.J., dissenting and thinking that the declaration of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was right, so that as far as mere weight of authority goes it was pretty equal.

E I need hardly say that the question is one of difficulty. On the best consideration I can give I think that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and BRETT, L.J., were right. The solution of the question before the House depends upon two questions: First, what is the true construction of the statutes putting a limit on the liability of ship-owners to make recompense in damages to those injured by a collision brought about in whole or in part by the negligence of their servants? Secondly, what is the nature of the recompense in damages awarded by the rule of the Admiralty between the owners of the two ships which came into collision, when both were to blame? I will first consider the statutes.

F The first Act which limited the liability of shipowners in cases of collision was the G 53 Geo. 3, c. 159 [1813], and though that Act has been repealed by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act, 1854, I think its provisions are material in construing those provisions which have been by the Act of 1854, as amended by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, substituted for those contained in it. The statute 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, begins by a recital that it was expedient to prevent any discouragement to merchants and others from being interested in shipping belonging to this realm, and it was confined to British ships. Section 1 enacted:

H "No person, owner or part owner of any ship, shall be subject or liable to answer for or make good any loss or damage arising or taking place by reason of any act, neglect, matter, or thing done, omitted or occasioned without the fault or privity of such owner, which may happen [to the cargo of the ship] or to any other vessel, [or to any goods being in or on board any other vessel] I further than the value of his or their ship or vessel, and the freight due, or to grow due for and during the voyage which may be in prosecution, or contracted for at the time of the happening of such loss or damage."

In 1818 in Wilson v. Dickson (10) the Court of King's Bench decided that the value of the ship was to be taken as "the existing value at the time when the loss takes place." In Brown v. Wilkinson (11), in 1846, PARKE, B., intimates a strong opinion that the value, if it was res integra, ought to be taken as the value at the time of the commencement of the voyage, but adds (15 M. & W. at p. 398):

"As however, the point has been decided by the case referred to, we should pause before we overruled that authority. It is not, however, necessary in this case to do so, for we think that according to the true meaning of that decision the value at the time of loss, to which the damages were then restrained, is the value at the moment the loss commences by the collision, whence the injury, and it is not to be reduced by the consideration that the defendant's vessel is about to founder, at which time it is really of no value, for that would be to exempt the defendant altogether, which the statute certainly does not contemplate under any circumstances."

This was quite sufficient to suggest the expediency of substituting a fixed rule for ascertaining the amount of the limit of liability, as was afterwards done, though not till 1862, by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of that year, s. 64. In the interval between these two cases, that of The Dundee (12), was decided by LORD STOWELL, in 1823. That was a case of collision in which the Dundee was solely to blame, and, consequently, her owners were liable for the whole loss. The question there raised was what was to be included in the word "appurtenances" in the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, a question no longer of importance since the repeal of that statute.

On a prohibition in Gale v. Laurie (13), the King's Bench put the same construction on the words as LORD STOWELL had done, so that the point, if still important, would probably be held concluded by authority. But the judgment of LORD STOWELL contains a great deal material to the present inquiry. He begins (1 Hag. Adm. at pp. 120, 121) by saying that the loss arose from "a want of that attention and vigilance due to the security of other vessels that are navigating on the same seas, and which, if so far neglected as to become, however unintentionally, the cause of damage of any extent to such other vessels, the maritime law considers as a dereliction of bounden duty, entitling the sufferer to reparation in damages. The quantum of reparation due in such cases has been differently measured in the maritime laws of different commercial countries, and of the same commercial country, among others our own, at different periods. The ancient general law exacted a full compensation out of all the property of the owners of the guilty ship upon the common principle applying to persons undertaking the conveyance of goods [HIS LORDSHIP, interposing: I should rather say undertaking the management of anything likely to do mischief unless attention and vigilance is used by those who manage it], that they are answerable for the conduct of the persons whom they employed, and of whom the other parties who suffered damage knew nothing, and over whom they had no control. To this rule our own country conformed; and it is not to be denied that the term compensation is not very accurately applied to any restitution that falls short of a fair and full indemnification for the injury done. But Holland having introduced a law for the protection of its navigation, that persons interested in it should not be liable beyond the value of that property of their own which they exposed to hazard—their ship, freight, apparel, and furniture—England followed in successive statutes, by which it protected owners from responsibility beyond their interests, first, in the case of embezzlements committed by some of the crew of the ship herself (7 Geo. 2, c. 15 [1733]), and in a succeeding statute (26 Geo. 3, c. 86 [1786]), this protection was extended to the case of embezzlements committed by other persons. The legislature proceeded in a later statute (53 Geo. 3, c. 159 [1813]) to give the same protection in the case of all losses otherwise produced. The latter statute, which most immediately applies to the present question, in the first enacting clause subjects the ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture and its freight, but in the following clauses, particularly in the 7th and 8th, the word 'appurtenances' is introduced, and is repeated as subject to contribution."

He then discusses the nature of the fishing stores on a Greenland voyage, and Hoskins v. Pickersgill (14), in which it was held that fishing stores were not in-

A cluded in the word "furniture" in the construction of a policy of insurance, and proceeds (ibid. at p. 124):

B "I am not sufficiently aware whether this would govern the construction of the same word occurring in an Act of Parliament or in the phraseology of a court in which its meaning is, perhaps, more to be collected from its proper and genuine import than from a prevailing understanding controlling its proper meaning in a contract between two individuals whose words were not to be carried beyond their own intentions in the contract. But it is unnecessary for me to pursue that question further, because it is an admitted fact that this mode of initiating a suit, by the arrest of the ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture, is the ancient formula of the court, though leading to a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners. The same formula has existed and operated its remedy under all the variations by which the remedy has been modified. It has been no further restricted than as the statute has restricted it; but the initiatory terms 'tackle, apparel, and furniture' founded the suit sufficiently to enable it to embrace all the objects which the statute left subject to its operation. These restrained them only by their own particular restrictions. The same words went as far as the general law went, notwithstanding the narrowness of those terms, and they must now go as far as the general law, limited only by that statute, extends."

E Before going further, I may observe, first, that neither in Wilson v. Dickson (10), The Dundee (12), nor in Brown v. Wilkinson (11), did any question arise as to how a court of equity was to work the jurisdiction given it in cases where there were several losses to several parties arising out of the same collision, and the fund brought into court was to be distributed among them rateably, which is the present case. In each of these cases there was one loss only. Next, that LORD STOWELL treats it as quite clear that, though the mode in which the Court of Admiralty founded its jurisdiction was by a seizure of the ship, the recompense in damages decreed by that court could be enforced against the owners out of all their property of every kind, so that the result was that by the general law the owners might be made to pay to their uttermost farthing the recompense in damages decreed by the Court of Admiralty, however small the value of their ship when seized was. PARKE, B., in Brown v. Wilkinson (11), says:

G "From the practice of the Court of Admiralty no light could be derived on this question, for that court proceeds in rem, and can only obtain jurisdiction by seizure, and the value when seized is the measure of liability."

H It is not, I think, necessary to decide between these very high authorities. If it were, I should wish to make further search among the cases on prohibition; but prima facie one would say that LORD STOWELL was more familiar with the subject, and, therefore, more likely to be accurate. And lastly, that LORD STOWELL seems to me to think that the recompense in damages was to be regulated according to the established law in the Court of Admiralty, which is my own opinion. What that established law is, is a question which I will discuss hereafter.

Where there were several losses occasioned to several persons by one act of negligence of those for whom the owner was responsible, the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 7, permitted the owner to file a bill

I "in any court of equity having competent jurisdiction against all the persons who shall have brought any such actions . . . and all other persons who shall claim to be entitled to any recompense for any loss or damage arising or happening by the same separate and distinct accident, act, neglect, or default, or on the same occasion to ascertain the amount of [the value], and for the payment and distribution thereof rateably among the several persons claiming recompense as aforesaid, in proportion to the amount of the several losses or damages sustained by such persons so claiming such recompense according to the rules of equity and as the case may require."

There are carefully drawn provisions requiring the plaintiff in such a bill to make all persons whom he knows of as having any claim for recompense arising out of that one transaction, defendants, so that they may, if they please, claim; and by s. 10 it is enacted that the court in which the bill is filed shall have full powers for ascertaining the value and the amount of the losses or damages claimed by the defendants respectively, and "generally to do what may appear to be just" in such suit. By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, this statute was repealed, and other enactments provided in the ninth part of that Act, ss. 504 and 505, were repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, and for these was substituted s. 64 of that latter Act.

It is in these words :

"The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say : 1. Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship; 2. Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such ship; 3. Where any loss of life or personal injury is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; 4. Where any loss or damage is, by reason of improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, or merchandise, to an aggregate amount exceeding £15 for each ton of their ship's tonnage, nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there is in addition loss of life or personal injury or not to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the ship's tonnage."

The case which we have to deal with falls within the fourth of these heads, and, as I think in respect of such losses the only difference intended to be made from the law as it was under 59 Geo. 3, c. 159, was to extend the protection to foreign ships as well as British, and to substitute as the limit of liability a fixed and easily ascertainable sum for the value of the ship, freight, and appurtenances.

As regards the mode in which the limitation of liability was to be worked out where there were more persons than one who had sustained loss from the same separate neglect or on the same occasion, the elaborate provisions of 59 Geo. 3, c. 159, are repealed, and in lieu of them is substituted s. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which I think was intended to give the jurisdiction to any court of equity in any part of the British dominions, and in Scotland to the Court of Session, but to make no other difference in the substance of the law. And I think, though the words are changed—principally I think with a view to brevity even at the risk of obscurity—they ought to be construed with reference to the former law and the extent to which it was intended to alter it. And, doing so, it seems to me that the phrase "be answerable in damages" is not to be confined to the damages to be recovered or enforced in an action directly brought against the owner, but it is to be construed as meaning that the aggregate of the recompenses which he has to distribute under s. 7, "according to the rules of equity, and as the case may require," shall be so limited. This is an important link in my chain of reasoning.

I think that the principle laid down in R. v. Lordale (15), as to the construction of statutes in pari materia applies; if I am wrong in this, so much of what I rely on is debile fundamentum, and I agree that so far fallit opus. If I am right, I cannot but think that if BAGGALLAY and CORTON, L.JJ., had had their attention called to the very wide words of s. 7 and s. 10 of the 53 Geo. 3, giving the court of equity, whose powers the Master of the Rolls was exercising, every power for distribution of the value among the several persons entitled to such recompenses, and "generally to do therein as shall appear to be just," and had agreed with me in

A thinking that though these words are not repeated in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 514, the previous law is to be borne in mind when construing that section, their opinions might have been different; at least, BAGGALLAY, L.J., would have more fully developed his reasons for thinking that the true construction of the Act compelled him to put a construction on it, which he, in the passage already cited, calls "apparently inequitable in its result." And COTTON, L.J., would have given

B his reasons for saying as he does that the result the Master of the Rolls had come to was "apparently against the words and meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act."

But the argument at your Lordships' Bar was mainly rested on the effect of the rule in Admiralty in the Court of Admiralty, and the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, before there was any limitation of liability at all. That court has jurisdiction over both the parties to a collision. Either of them may, if he pleases,

C abandon or not exercise his right to claim a recompense from the other. But when one does institute a suit the other cannot baffle him by refusing to appear, even though his ship is not within reach of the court; the institution of the suit gives a maritime lien against the ship, forming the foundation of an inchoate right to seize the vessel whenever it comes within the reach of the court, even though in the meantime it had become the property of a bona fide purchaser without

D notice: The Bold Buccleugh (16). And according to LORD STOWELL in The Dundee (12), the Court of Admiralty, when it seized the ship, could enforce a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners, however small the value of the ship seized might be. These cases were not cited by BRETT, L.J., but they seem to me strong authorities in favour of the view he took of the Admiralty procedure.

E In the present case, as in most others, both parties appeared and both made claims. And the great question was whether both, or only one, and, if so, which, of the vessels was to blame. It was ultimately decided that both were to blame, and then the court pronounced the judgment which since the decision of this House in Hay v. Le Neve (5) has always been pronounced in such cases, viz., that the

F collision in question in the cause was occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Khedive, and by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Voorwaarts, and that the damage arising therefrom ought to be borne equally by the owners of the Khedive and the owners of the Voorwaarts. I say that this has always been the form of the judgment since Hay v. Le Neve (5). I do not think that such could have been the form of the judgment before that case, for it

G would have had an important bearing on the question then in issue, and not only was LORD GIFFORD, who presided, a very accurate lawyer, but it appears from the report that he consulted LORD STOWELL, who furnished him with authorities, and would certainly have quoted the form of the judgment if it had then existed. Before the decision in Hay v. Le Neve (5) LORD STOWELL had in The Woodrop-Sims (2) laid down that when both ships were to blame "the rule of law is that the H loss must be apportioned between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them." As the Woodrop was solely to blame he had no occasion to say on what principle it was to be apportioned. In The Lord Melville (1), a case not reported anywhere, as far as I can find, but cited by LORD GIFFORD in Hay v. Le Neve (5) from a shorthand note of the judgment furnished to him, he said:

I "The ancient rule of the Admiralty was that it should be considered a common loss to which they were justly liable."

I do not doubt that "justly" is a misprint for "jointly."

The court of Session had in Hay v. Le Neve (5) apportioned the damage by making the ship most to blame bear two-thirds of it, and the ship least to blame one-third, and the question before the House was if this was right? In that case only one of the ships had put in a claim, and there was no cross-claim—why, I do not know—but the House had not to consider any question arising from the absence of a cross-claim. LORD GIFFORD consulted LORD STOWELL, and was furnished by him with a note of a decision of SIR JAMES MARRIOTT. That was in a case in which the Petersfield and the Judith had come in collision, and both were to blame, but the Judith most, and in which—I do not quite understand how—the Judith had recovered £230 damages against the Petersfield. The decision of SIR JAMES MARRIOTT was,

“that the whole damage sustained by the Petersfield and her cargo, as well as the £230 damages and expenses given against the ship Petersfield, and the costs on both sides, be borne equally by the parties in this suit.”

I may observe that LORD STOWELL introduced a rule that, though the damages were to be divided, each party should, in such cases, bear his own costs, and that it has been determined that the liability of the shipowner to make good costs is in no way affected by the statutes limiting his liability: see Ex parte Ruynne (17).

In these authorities the decision of the House of Lords was that the damages arising from the collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of the two ships in fault. I do not think attention was called to the effect which this might have on the interest of the innocent owners of cargo. In the possible event of one set of owners proving insolvent while the others were solvent, the owner of the cargo would, if the rule was as laid down in The Lord Melville (1) that the owners were liable jointly, receive full indemnification for his loss from the solvent owners; by the rule as laid down in Hay v. Le Neve (5) he only gets one-half from them, and gets a dividend only from the insolvent owners. This rule has been stigmatised as judicium rusticorum, and is justified on the ground of general expediency avoiding interminable litigation at the cost of some inevitable injustice in particular cases. But if the recompense in damages which the one ship is to make to the other is to be considered as quite a distinct thing from that which the other is to make to it, this injustice is increased in a manner which is not only not inevitable, but which, as it seems to me, it requires some subtle and technical reasoning to bring about. It was not disputed that in practice, when the damages were ascertained, and it proved that the damage to one ship was greater than that to the other, the balance, and the balance only, was paid. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Co. (9), said that balance “was all that is ever recovered in the action, that is the substance of it.” He had just before said that “the monition finally issues for the balance.” Inquiry has been made and it turns out that the parties to collision suits having always given substantial bail; there is no instance to be found in which a monition ever issued at all, the money being always paid without anything in the nature of an execution. But I think it can be hardly doubtful that if in any case it ever should be necessary to issue a monition it would not be issued for more than the balance. Had the statute of 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, been unrepealed, and had the Master of the Rolls been exercising the jurisdiction given in such wide terms by s. 7 to determine “according to the rules of equity, and as the case may require,” and by s. 10 “generally to do therein as shall appear to be just,” I do not think that there could be much doubt that he did right in making his order according to the substance of what was done.

I have already expressed my opinion that the statute now in force, though couched in different words, is to be construed as giving the same power as was given by the repealed Act. The very ingenious argument of counsel for the respondent was I think this: there was from very early times a jurisdiction exercised by the courts of common law, and I presume by all superior courts, to prevent their process being abused or used for the purposes of oppression, and, therefore, when A. had obtained a judgment in one court against B., on which he was about to issue execution for the full amount, the court, on its being brought to their notice by B. that he had obtained a judgment against A., either in the same court or another, on which he could issue execution against A., would restrain A. from issuing execution on the judgment in their court except on the terms that he consented to set the one against the other, and would issue execution only for the balance.

A There were differences of practice in the Queen's Bench, and in the Common Pleas at one time, as to the extent to which the interests of the attorneys were considered: see Hall v. Ody (18); but those I need not notice, and it was argued with great ingenuity that the cross-claims of the two ships which had come into collision were as distinct as any two actions in different courts, and that the undenied practice merely arose from the Admiralty interfering to prevent the abuse of its process.

B Even if this were made out I should be unwilling to give effect to what I cannot but think very technical and artificial reasoning. But I do not think it is made out. The two claims arose out of one and the same accident. They are determined in one and the same court, and they depend on one and the same question, namely, were both or only one of the parties to blame? That question is determined once for all between the same parties, and the amount of the damage is also determined by the same court, and between the same parties. Even if the course of pleading had always been as it appears latterly to have been to condemn each separately and order the damages to be assessed separately, I should still say that they were in substance at least, not distinct and separate actions. But as I have pointed out, I think there can have been no settled form before Hay v. Le Neve (5). I think the forms produced were all comparatively modern. No practical consequences resulted from these forms, and consequently nothing called upon the courts to consider to what consequences they led. In The Seringapatam (7) where the Seringapatam and the Harriet had come into collision, and the owners of the Harriet, which had gone to the bottom, refused to give bail to the action against them by the Seringapatam, DR. LUSHINGTON decided, I cannot but think erroneously, that he had no power to stay the action by the owners of the Harriet till they gave bail in the action against them. Whether he was right or not is not, since the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, material, but he so thought, and that looks as if he thought them distinct actions. But when the Seringapatam dropped its action against the Harriet, and the Harriet proceeded against the Seringapatam, and finally judgment was given that both were to blame, and that judgment was affirmed on appeal, the question was raised in a very practical shape. The counsel for the owners of the Harriet argued that the Court of Appeal had in effect, though not in express terms, said that the owners of the Harriet should receive a clear moiety of the damage. DR. LUSHINGTON took a course which could not be justified on the ground that the court was preventing an abuse of its process, on any other ground than that taken by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Co. (9)—that they were not independent actions, and that the substance was that the balance only should be paid.

G I have only to add that, while I think that the Chancery Division in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Co. (9), and the Admiralty Division in the present case, must conduct the limitation action brought under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 514, according to the procedure as altered by the various subsequent Acts, those Acts make no difference in the substance of what they are to do. They ought to make exactly the same declarations, and do the same things which the Court of Session following their own procedure ought to have done if the limitation action had been brought in that court. I began by saying what was the question intended to be decided in this House. I doubt if it is raised, I doubt if the appeal is not premature, but I do not think that your Lordships should on that account refrain from deciding it. If the House adopts the view which I take of the law, I think the proper order would be to adopt that of the Master of the Rolls in the former case, and declare "that the defendants, the owners of the Voorwaarts, are entitled to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the damage sustained by the steamship Khedive, and to be paid in respect of such balance pari passu with the other claimants out of the fund in court," and with the declaration to remit the action to the Admiralty Division to do what is just in the action. I have had the opportunity of perusing the opinion of LORD BRAMWELL, who takes the opposite view. I have read it very attentively, but it has not changed my opinion. A LORD WATSON.—I have only to state my entire concurrence in the opinions which have just been delivered.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I entirely agree that the question is: What was the practice or what is the practice or law of the Court of Admiralty in proceedings in that court where both ships are held to be to blame? If I had had to form my own opinion upon that matter unassisted and unbiased by the opinions of my noble and learned friends who have addressed your Lordships, I confess that I should have come to a different conclusion from that to which they have come, because I should, upon an examination of the practice and what I may call the necessity of the case, have come to the conclusion that there were separate decrees in each case for the damages, or a moiety of the damages, sustained by each ship, and that the fact that the balance was afterwards ascertained, was a mere matter of arrangement and convenience for the avoidance of what I may call a sort of circuitry of proceeding, that is to say, a payment by one ship and repayment by the other. B C

I must say that at the present moment it seems to me extremely difficult to say that that must not of necessity be the law; because what is to happen if proceedings are brought by the owners of one ship in one court and by the owners of the other ship in another court in another country? or, if the owners of the ship sued in this country do not think fit to bring their cross-action or to make their counterclaim, I cannot see what is to happen in such a case as that; and I can foresee great difficulties from the opinions which have just been expressed in your Lordships' House in the case of actions which may be brought in the common law courts in this country. I must acknowledge that I had written a long opinion in support of the views which I am now expressing, but it is not my intention to trouble your Lordships with that opinion, for I really have not confidence enough in my own opinion, in a matter of this description, to differ from the opinions which have been expressed by my noble and learned friends who have already spoken. It is not a question of principle; it is not a question of reason; but it is a question of what was the law of the Court of Admiralty; because, undoubtedly, what was the law formerly is the law still, for the Judicature Act has not changed the law in that respect. I, therefore, will not trouble your Lordships with the opinion which I should have expressed, for I feel bound to give up my own judgment in a case of this description, yielding to the opinions of my noble and learned friends. D E F G

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—The order which I should propose to your Lordships and move for the purpose of giving effect to the opinions which have been expressed by the majority of your Lordships upon this appeal is to reverse the order appealed from, and to affirm the judgment of the Admiralty Division dated April 5, 1881, with the following declaration: That the defendants, the owners of the steam vessel Voorwarts are entitled to prove against the fund paid into court under that judgment for a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the steam vessel Khedive, and to be paid in respect of the balance due to them after such deduction pari passu with the other claimants out of such fund. It will be for your Lordships to consider what ought to be done with regard to the costs in the court below and here. With respect to that question, I venture to point out to your Lordships that this case comes before the House not under the ordinary circumstances which make it fit to apply the rule that the costs should follow the event, but under these circumstances, that in another case—namely, Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Co. (9), between other parties, a decision had been pronounced by the Court of Appeal reversing the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, which it was inevitably necessary for the court below to follow unless it was reversed by this House. The point also was one which all your Lordships felt to be a point of H I

A difficulty involving an abstruse matter of law. Taking all these circumstances into account, and I may add quite consistently, as it seems to me, with the principle of the rule which we are applying, I would submit to your Lordships that no costs should be given either in the Court of Appeal or of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

BRUNSDEN v. HUMPHREY

D [COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., and Bowen, L.J.), February 12, July 12, 1884]

[Reported 14 Q.B.D. 141; 53 L.J.Q.B. 476; 51 L.T. 529; 49 J.P. 4; 32 W.R. 944]

Estoppel—Res judicata—Two actions arising out of the same incident—Different causes of action—Damage to property—Personal injury.

E A person cannot in different actions recover successive amounts of damages for the same cause of action. When he first brings the action he must recover all the damages to which he is entitled in respect of that cause of action. One test whether one action is in respect of the same cause of action as another action is whether the same evidence would prove the plaintiff's case in both actions; another test is whether the two actions are in respect of the infringement of different rights.

F Per BOWEN, L.J.: The real test is not whether the plaintiff had the opportunity of recovering in the first action what he claims to recover in the second.

G The plaintiff sued the defendant in the county court to recover damages for injury done to his cab in a collision caused by the negligence of the defendant's servant, and obtained judgment and an award of damages. Afterwards the plaintiff sued the defendant in the High Court to recover damages for personal injury which he had suffered in the same collision.

H Held: by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and BOWEN, L.J. (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., dissenting on the facts) that the damage to the cab and the personal injury suffered by the plaintiff constituted two distinct causes of action, and, therefore, the judgment recovered in the county court was no bar to the subsequent action in the High Court in which the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of a Divisional Court (POLLOCK, B., and LOPES, J.) making absolute a rule nisi to enter judgment for the defendant in an action tried by GROVE, J., and a jury.

- D The plaintiff was a cab driver, and while he was driving his cab a two-horse van driven by the defendant's servant came into collision with the cab, and the plaintiff was thrown from the box. The plaintiff sued the defendant in the Whitechapel County Court to recover the amount of the damage done to the cab. The particulars were as follows:

- E For carelessly driving a van into a cab £4 3s. 0d.

Repairing woodwork	1	8	0
Painting	1	5	0
Three weeks' hire of cab	1	10	0

The defendant paid the amount claimed, and costs, into court. Afterwards the plaintiff discovered that he had sustained more serious personal injury owing to the collision than he had at first been aware of, and he wrote to the defendant asking for compensation. His request was refused, and he commenced the present

- G action in the High Court to recover damages for the injury which he had suffered by being thrown from the box of the cab in the collision. At the trial before GROVE, J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £350 damages. A rule was obtained calling on the plaintiff to show cause why there should not be a new trial or judgment entered for the defendant, on the ground of misdirection by the learned judge in not holding that the proceedings in the county court were a bar to the present action. On July 5, 1883, the Divisional Court (POLLOCK, B., and LOPES, J.) made the rule absolute to enter judgment for the defendant, and from that decision the plaintiff appealed.

July 12, 1884. The following judgments were read.

SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—It was urged on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff could not succeed in the second action because he had already recovered damages in respect of the collision, and no person can sue twice for the same cause of action. Upon the other side it was said that the two injuries, although one part of the cause of action was common to both, were in reality two different causes of action, and no rule exists against bringing separate actions for two separate and distinct causes of action. It was admitted that it may be oppressive A to bring several actions, but it was said that if they were brought oppressively the court would have power to stop them, but that in this case, where there was an undeveloped injury, an action is brought bona fide and is not oppressive. Therefore the question is whether the causes of action are the same, because the law is that a person cannot in different actions recover successive amounts of damages for the same cause of action, but he must when he first brings the action recover all B the damages to which he is entitled in respect of that cause of action.

When this rule is applied to damages which are or must be known to the plaintiff at the time of the first action, I have always thought it a good rule; but when applied to cases where the damage is not known at the time of the first action, but develops itself afterwards, and when the claim is made bona fide for ulterior damages, and could not in fact have been made at the time of the first action C because the further damage was not known, I have always been of opinion that it is a harsh rule, and if it were to be established now for the first time it could not have my concurrence. It is based upon the maxim that it is for the benefit of the State that the litigation of individuals should come to an end. To my mind, that is one of those maxims which appear to be the less true the more one looks into them. It cannot matter to the State, and the maxim is never vouched except D in cases where the subsequent litigation would be just if it were not for the maxim. In these cases of undeveloped injury the maxim is not only untrue, but also unjust as between individuals. However, the rule exists, and I have not the smallest intention of cavilling at it. It must remain, although the subsequent injuries are unknown and cannot be known. Nevertheless, in cases where there has already been a trial, one is to suppose that which is not the truth, viz., that E the first jury tried the case when the subsequent damage or injury could not be known to them, and that they have in contemplation of law given damages for the prospective injury.

The question is whether the cause of action in this case is the same as that in the former action. The cause of action alleged is an injury to the plaintiff's person by reason of the negligent driving of the defendant's servant. The existence F of that negligence and the collision alone do not give any cause of action. Supposing that by negligent driving the wheel of a cart is run against a carriage and there is no injury caused, the owner of the carriage could not succeed in an action for nominal damages; such an action would not lie. The cause of action in such a case is the negligence which causes appreciable injury to the vehicle. There must be both the negligence and the appreciable injury. Therefore, in the first G action the cause of action was the negligent driving and the appreciable injury to the plaintiff's cab. Suppose that in the days of strict pleading the plaintiff had relied upon that cause of action, and had pleaded it, he could not have given evidence of the personal injury. The cause of action in such a case is injury to property. That is the cause of action, and is in respect of a right of property.
Now the plaintiff brings an action in which he says that he has been injured in H his person. That is a different right. He has a perfect right by law to have his person unmolested by the negligence of another man's servant. The mere fact of the defendant's vehicle having touched or shaken the person of the plaintiff would give no cause of action if no appreciable damage had been caused. Therefore, it is clear that the cause of action is the negligent driving and the injury to the plaintiff's person; that is, the injury to the right to have his person unmolested. I
That is a distinct cause of action, and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the second action.

That in itself seems to me to be sufficient reasoning upon which to found a decision that the two causes of action are different. But different tests have been applied by judges at different times. They are not grounds of judgments, but tests by which to determine sometimes, but not always, whether the causes of action are the same or different. A very good, though not always a very accurate, test is to see whether the same sort of evidence would prove both cases. It is

A plain that, where damage to a vehicle is in question, persons who know about vehicles should be called to show what the injury was, but in the case of injury to the person doctors are called to show what was the external or internal damage to the person. The cases would be tried with two different sets of witnesses. In my opinion that is only a test, and not always an accurate one, but here it is sufficient to show that the causes of action are different. Therefore, in my opinion, we are not called upon in this case to apply the maxim I have mentioned, which for my part I think the law ought never to apply except in cases where it has already been determined that it must apply. It ought not to be stretched, and it is not applicable in this case. Therefore I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum awarded to him by the jury. Two different actions may be brought for different causes of action, but not to recover damages for the same cause of action. It follows that the judgment of the Divisional Court cannot be supported, and this appeal ought to be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—The plaintiff has recovered a verdict and £350 damages for personal injuries sustained by him through the negligence of the defendant's servants in driving a van, which had come into collision with the plaintiff's cab, thrown the plaintiff from his box, and seriously injured him in his legs. Previously to bringing the action the plaintiff had sued the defendant in the county court for damages done to his cab in the collision, and the particulars delivered under this plaintiff had been confined to the damages which the cab had sustained. The defendant in the county court action paid £4 3s. into court together with 6s. costs, upon which the plaintiff had discontinued the county court plaint. The present action was brought in the High Court for personal injuries, of the importance and extent of which the plaintiff alleged that he had been ignorant at the time of the county court proceedings. On a motion for a new trial the court below have entered a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the recovery in the county court of damages in respect of the cab is a bar to any further action for injury to the plaintiff's person.

The rule of the ancient common law is that where one is barred in any action real or personal by judgment, demurrer, confession, or verdict, he is barred as to that or the like action of the like nature for the same thing for ever. LORD COKE, in a note to Ferrer's Case (1) said (6 Co. Rep. at p. 9a):

"It has been well said, 'interest republicæ ut sit finis litium,' otherwise 'great oppression might be done under colour and pretence of law.'"

See also Sparry's Case (2); Higgins' Case (3); YEAR BOOK, 12 Edw. 4, p. 13, 9. Accordingly in Hudson v. Lee (4) it was held to be a good plea in bar to an appeal of maihem that the appellant had recovered damages in an action for trespass brought for the same assault, battery, and wounding. So in Bird v. Randall (5) it was decided to be an answer to an action for seducing a man's servant from his service that penalties had previously been recovered by the master in satisfaction of the injury done him. So too in Phillips v. Berryman (6) a recovery in replevin was held to be a good bar to an action on the Statute of Marlbridge for an excessive distress on the ground that the plaintiff had already had his remedy, and that a recovery in one personal action is a bar to all other personal actions on the same subject.

The principle is frequently stated in the form of another legal proverb: Nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa. It is a well-settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all. The difficulty in each instance arises upon the application of this rule, How far is the cause which is being litigated afresh the same cause in substance with that which has been the subject of the previous suit? DE GREY, C.J., in Hitchin v. Campbell (7) said (2 Wm. Bl. at p. 831):

"The principal consideration is whether it be precisely the same cause of action in both, appearing by proper averments in a plea, or by proper facts stated in a special verdict, or a Special Case. One great criterion of this identity is that the same evidence will maintain both actions :” A see per LORD ELDON in Martin v. Kennedy (8). GROSE, J., in Seddon v. Tutop (9) said that the question was not whether the sum demanded might have been recovered in the former action, but the only inquiry was whether the same cause of action had been litigated and considered in the former action. Accordingly,

“though a declaration contain counts under which the plaintiff’s whole demand might be recovered, yet, if no attempt has been made to give evidence of some of the claims, they may be recovered in another action.” B

Thorpe v. Cooper (10) (5 Bing. at p. 129). It is evident, therefore, that the application of the rule depends, not upon any technical considerations of identity of cause of action, but upon matters of substance. C

I have now to consider the application of the above doctrine to the present action; and the question to be decided is whether the damage done by the negligent driving of the defendant’s servant to the plaintiff’s cab is in substance the same cause of action as the damage caused by such negligence to the plaintiff’s person. Nobody can doubt that, if the plaintiff had recovered any damages for injuries to his person, he could not have maintained a further action for fresh bodily injuries caused by the same act of negligence, merely because they had been discovered or developed subsequently: see Ferrer v. Beale (11). The court in that case said (1 Ld. Raym. at pp. 339, 340): D

“The jury have in the former action considered the nature of the wound and given damages for all the damage that it had done to the plaintiff.” E

This authority, however, leaves still open the point we now have to determine—whether the cause of action arising from damage to the plaintiff’s cab is in substance identical with that which accrues in consequence of the damage caused to his person.

In order clearly to elucidate this question, let me assume for the sake of argument that the damage had been caused by some act of the defendant himself, and not merely an act of his servant. According to the old distinctions of forms of actions, which still have a historical value as throwing light upon the principles and definitions of the common law, the form of action upon such an hypothesis would have been trespass to the person for the personal injury—trespass to goods for the damage to the vehicle. Injury would have been done to the plaintiff in respect of two absolute and independent rights, the distinction between which is inveterate both in the English and the Roman law. Everyone in this country has an absolute right to security for his person. Everybody has, further, an absolute right to have the enjoyment of his goods and chattels unmeddled with by others. In the hypothetical case I am assuming both these rights would have been injured, and, though the two injuries might have been combined in one suit, could it have been said that the subject-matter of each grievance was the same? F

Applying the test of identity furnished by DE GREY, C.J., in Hitchin v. Campbell (7), the first matter that is obvious is that the same evidence would not have supported an action for trespass to the person and an action for trespass to the goods. In the one case the identity of the man injured and the character of his injuries would be in issue, and justifications might conceivably be pleaded as to the assault which would have nothing to do with the damage done to the goods and chattels. In the other case the plaintiff’s title to the goods might have been in issue, in addition to the question of the damage done to them. Different provisions of the Statute of Limitations might possibly have applied in each case. And, finally, the damage in one case might have been directly due to the wrongful act complained of; in the other case it might not. G

There is no authority, so far as I know, in the books for the proposition that the recovery in an action for a trespass to the person would be a bar to the maintenance of an action for any trespass to goods committed at the same time. In H

- A the present instance, as the defendant himself was not driving, but his servant, trespass would not have lain under the old law, and the plaintiff's remedy would have been in an action on the case for negligence, based on the negligent management by the servant of his master's horses, a negligence for which in the eye of the law the master or employer is responsible. What is the gist of such an action on the case for negligence? If the whole of the plaintiff's case were to be stated,
- B and the entire story told, it seems to me that it would have comprised two separate or distinct grievances, narrated, it is true, in one statement of case. Actions for the negligent management of any animal, or any personal or movable chattel, such as a ship or machine or instrument, are all based upon the same principle, viz., that a person who contrary to his duty conducts himself negligently in the management of that which contains in itself an element of danger to others, is
- C liable for all injury caused by his want of care or skill. Such an action is based upon the union of the negligence and the injuries caused thereby, which in such an instance will as a rule involve, and have been accompanied by, specific damage. Without remounting to the Roman law, or discussing the refinements of scholastic jurisprudence and the various uses that have been made either by judges or juridical writers of the terms "injuria" and "damnum," it is sufficient to say that
- D the gist of an action for negligence seems to me to be the harm to person or property negligently perpetrated.

In a certain class of cases the mere violation of a legal right imports a damage. PARKE, B., in Embrey v. Owen (12) said (6 Exch. at p. 368):

- E "Actual perceptible damage is not indispensable as the foundation of an action; it is sufficient to show the violation of a right, in which case the law will presume damage."

But this principle is not as a rule applicable to actions for negligence which are not brought to establish a bare right, but to recover compensation for substantial injury. LITLEDALE, J., in Williams v. Morland (13) said (2 B. & C. at p. 916):

- F "Generally speaking there must be a temporal loss or damage accruing from the wrongful act of another, in order to entitle a party to maintain an action on the case:"

- see Fay v. Prentice (14) (1 C.B. at p. 835) per MAULE, J. This leads me to consider whether, in the case of an accident caused by negligent driving, in which both the goods and the person of the plaintiff are injured, there is one cause of action only, or two causes of action which are severable and distinct. This is a
- G very difficult question to answer, and I feel great doubt and hesitation in differing from the judgment of the court below, and from the great authority of the present Chief Justice of England. According to the popular use of language the defendant's servant has done one act and one only—the driving of the one vehicle negligently against the other. But the rule of law which I am discussing is not framed with reference to loose popular expressions of the sort, but for the sake of preventing an
- H abuse of substantial justice. Two separate kinds of injury were in fact inflicted, and two wrongs done. The mere negligent driving in itself, if accompanied by no injury to the plaintiff, was not actionable at all, for it was not a wrongful act at all till a wrong arose out of the damage which it caused. One wrong was done as soon as the plaintiff's enjoyment of his property was substantially interfered with. A further wrong arose as soon as the driving also caused injury to the plaintiff's
- I person.

Both causes of action, in one sense, may be said to be founded upon one act of the defendant's servant, but they are not on that account identical causes of action. The wrong consists in the damage done without lawful excuse, not the act of driving, which if no damage had ensued, would have been legally unimportant. It certainly would appear unsatisfactory to hold that the damage done in a carriage accident to a man's portmanteau was the same injury as the damage done to his spine, or that an action under Lord Campbell's Act by the widow and children of a person who had been killed in a railway collision is barred by proof that the plaintiff recovered in his lifetime for the damage done to his luggage. It may be said that it would be convenient to force persons to sue for all their grievances at once, and not to split their demands; but there is no positive law (except so far as the County Court Acts have from a very early date dealt with the matter) against splitting demands which are essentially separable (see Seddon v. Tutop (9)), although the High Court has inherent power to prevent vexation or oppression, and by staying proceedings, or by apportioning the costs, would have always ample means of preventing any injustice arising out of the reckless use of legal procedure.

In the present case the plaintiff's particulars in the county court were confined to the damage done to his cab; the injury to his person, therefore, was neither litigated nor considered in the county court. The real test is not, I think, whether the plaintiff had the opportunity of recovering in the first action what he claims to recover in the second: see Seddon v. Tutop (9). With all respect I do not see how it can be said that Nelson v. Couch (15) so decides. That case establishes only the converse rule, viz., that the maxim nemo debet bis vexari cannot apply where in the first action the plaintiff had no such opportunity of satisfying his claim. The language of COLERIDGE, J., and the other members of the court in Hodsoll v. Stallebrass (16) must, I think, be read by the light of the special circumstances of that case, and so read is not inconsistent with the view at which I have here arrived. I am in no way departing from the language of this authority in holding, as I do in the present instance, that the damage for which the plaintiff is now suing accrues from a different injury, and, therefore, a different wrong, from that for which he recovered damages in the county court. The view at which I have arrived is in conformity with the reasoning of the judgment recently pronounced by this court in Mitchell v. Darley Main Colliery Co. (17), where it was held (overruling Lamb v. Walker (18)), that each fresh subsidence of soil in the case of withdrawal of support gave rise to a fresh cause of action. Nor do I feel called upon to extend the application of the sound and valuable principle of law that none shall be vexed twice for the same cause of action to a case to which it has never yet been applied, and to which it can only be applied by pursuing analogy to lengths which would involve practical injustice. The present case is one in which I am conscious that lawyers of great authority do differ and will differ. But on the whole, in my opinion, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be reversed, and the judgment entered at the trial for the plaintiff be restored, with costs to the plaintiff, including the costs below and of this appeal.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case I am, with much regret, unable to concur in the judgment of my brother BOWEN, to which I understand the Master of the Rolls to assent. I should have been glad, in the face of this difference of opinion, to have given reasons at length for my inability to agree in the judgment. But the plaintiff very naturally presses for judgment, and I am unable to do more than shortly to express my dissent. It appears to me that whether the negligence of the servant or the impact of the vehicle which the servant drove be the technical cause of action, equally the cause is one and the same. That the injury done to the plaintiff is injury done to him, at one and the same moment, by one and the same act, in respect of different rights—i.e., his person and his goods—I do not in the least deny; but it seems to me a subtlety not warranted by law to hold that a man cannot bring two actions if he is injured in his arm and in his leg, but can bring two if, besides his arm and leg being injured, his trousers, which contain his leg, and his coatsleeve, which contains his arm, have been torn. The consequences of holding this are so serious, and may be very probably so oppressive, that I at least must respectfully dissent from a judgment which establishes it. I think the court below was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

MERSEY STEEL AND IRON CO., LTD. v. NAYLOR, BENZON & CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (the Earl of Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn, Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell and Lord FitzGerald), March 27, 28, 1884]

[Reported 9 App. Cas. 434; 53 L.J.Q.B. 497; 51 L.T. 637;
32 W.R. 989]

Contract—Release—Repudiation by other party—Conduct not amounting to absolute refusal to perform contract.

Company—Winding-up—Proof of debt—Unliquidated damages—Application of bankruptcy rule.

C

The respondents agreed to purchase from the appellant company a quantity of steel to be delivered on board ship in five monthly instalments, payment to be made within three days after the receipt of the shipping documents. After a portion of the first instalment had been delivered, but before payment, a petition was presented to wind-up the appellant company, and the respondents wrote that they were advised that they could not safely pay for the steel delivered while the petition was pending. The appellant company replied that they would treat the refusal to pay as a repudiation of the contract. The liquidator, after some further correspondence, refused to make any further deliveries, and brought this action for the price of what had been delivered.

Held: to determine whether one party to a contract was relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the other party must be examined to see whether that conduct amounted to a renunciation, an absolute refusal, to perform the contract such as would amount to rescission if he had the power to rescind, and in the present case the respondents had not been guilty of such conduct; moreover, the contract was for the sale and purchase of the total quantity of steel mentioned therein and not for a number of individual deliveries, and so, in the absence of express words, the payment by the respondents forthwith for one delivery was not a condition precedent to the delivery of the next instalment; therefore, the appellants were not released from the contract, and were liable to the respondents for its breach.

Held, further: the effect of s. 10 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875 [see now the Company's Act, 1948, s. 317] was to import into the rules relating to the winding-up of companies the provision in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30 (1)] that a demand in the nature of unliquidated damages was provable in bankruptcy provided that it arose by reason of a contract, and, therefore, the respondents could prove in the winding-up of the appellant company for the damages for the breach of contract.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) reported 9 Q.B.D. 648, reversing a decision of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in a case tried before him without a jury.

B Cohen, Q.C., and French (C. Russell, Q.C., with them) for the appellants.
Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., and Bigham, Q.C., for the respondents.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—In this case I will deal first with the last point which has been argued, and it appears to me that it lies within a very narrow compass.

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, provided by s. 10 that :

C "... in the winding-up of any company . . . whose assets may prove to be insufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities the same rules shall prevail and be observed . . . as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt."

D I cannot help pausing to observe upon what is a little remarkable in that enactment. It is not the rules that were in force when the Act of 1875 was passed, but the rules which "may be in force for the time being"; marking very strongly the principle on which the legislature in this enactment proceeded, namely, that they treated the cases as in pari materia, governed by the principles which govern the law of insolvency or bankruptcy, and that it was safe not only to apply the then existing rules upon that subject, but to apply them with any future addition or alteration which in legislation as to bankruptcy might be thought fit. Among
 E the rules which are to be imported from bankruptcy there are included the rules "as to debts and liabilities provable." The first section in that division of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which is under the sub-heading: "Payment of debts and distribution of assets," is one which, following a series of earlier statutes, makes demands in the nature of unliquidated damages, arising by reason of contract, provable in bankruptcy, and similar demands which do not so arise, and which are
 F not of that nature, not provable [Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30 (1)]. The Act defines what are to be proved, all debts and liabilities and obligations, except certain things which are excepted. There are two or three sections dealing with special matters, and we then come to s. 39 [Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31] which occurs under the same division of the statute :

G "Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between the bankrupt and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under his bankruptcy, an account shall be taken of what is due from one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively."

H Your Lordships observe that it is not that it may be, it is not a thing which is optional, but it is a positive, absolute, rule for the purpose of proof in bankruptcy, and nothing can be proved according to that rule in such cases except the balance of the account. That only is regarded as the claim which it is competent for the creditor to make when he comes in to prove under the bankruptcy. That being
 I so, how is it possible to say that this is not a rule, both within the general spirit and intention of the section, and within the express words "as to debts and liabilities provable?"

Upon the other point, I do not think it desirable to lay down larger rules than the case may require, or than former authorities may have laid down for my guidance, or to go into possible cases differing from the one with which we have to deal. I am content to take the rule as stated by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Freeth v. Burr (1), which is in substance that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether one party to a contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part. Nothing more is necessary in the present case than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here. A

Before doing so, however, I must say one or two words in order to show why I cannot adopt the argument of counsel for the appellants so far as it represented the payment by the respondents for the iron delivered as a condition precedent, and coming within the rules of law applicable to conditions precedent. If it were so, there would be an end of the case; but to me it is plain beyond the possibility of controversy that, upon the proper construction of this contract, it is not, and cannot be, a condition precedent. The contract is for the purchase of five thousand tons of steel blooms of the company's manufacture; therefore, it is one contract for the purchase of that quantity of steel blooms. No doubt, there are subsidiary terms in the contract as to the time of delivery: "Delivery one thousand tons monthly commencing January next;" and as to the time of payment, "Payment nett cash within three days after receipt of shipping documents." That, however, does not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be deliveries for the purpose, of so many distinct quantities of iron. It is quite consistent with the natural meaning of the contract that it is to be one contract for the purchase of that quantity of iron, to be delivered at those times, and in that manner, and for which payment is so to be made. It is perfectly clear that no particular payment can be a condition precedent of the entire contract, because the delivery under the contract was most certainly to precede payment, and that being so, I do not see how, without express words, it can possibly be made a condition precedent to the subsequent fulfilment of the unfulfilled part of the contract by the delivery of the undelivered steel. B C D E

Quite consistently with that view it appears to me, according to the authorities and according to sound reason and principle, that the parties might have so conducted themselves as to release each other from the contract, and that one party might have so conducted himself as to leave it at the option of the other party to relieve himself from a future performance of the contract. The question is whether the facts here justify that conclusion? The facts relied upon, without reading all the evidence, are these. The company at the time when the money was about to become payable for the steel actually delivered fell into difficulties, and a petition was presented against them. Section 153 of the Companies Act, 1862, appeared to the advisers of the purchasers to admit of the construction that, until in those circumstances the petition was disposed of by an order for the company to be wound-up or otherwise, there would be no one who could receive, and could give a good discharge for, the amount due. There is not, upon the letters and documents, the slightest ground for supposing either that the purchasers could not pay, or that they were unwilling to pay, the amount due; but they acted as they did evidently bona fide, because they doubted, on the advice of their solicitor, whether that section of the Act, as long as the petition was pending, did not make it impossible for them to obtain the discharge to which they had an unquestionable right. Therefore the case which I put during the argument is analogous to that which according to the advice they received they supposed to exist, namely, the case of a man who has died between delivery and the time when payment ought to be made, he being the only person to whom payment is due, and until there is a legal personal representative of that person no receipt can be given for the money. F G H I

By the Act of 1862, in the event of a winding-up order being made, it would date from the time when the petition was presented; and this section, which no doubt, according to its true construction, only deals with alienations of the property of the appellant company, was supposed by the solicitor of the purchasers to make it questionable whether the payment of a debt due to the company—to the persons who, if there had been no petition, would have had a right to

A receive it—might not be held, in the event of a winding-up order being made, to be a payment of the property of the company to a wrong person, and, therefore, an alienation. I cannot ascribe to their conduct, under these circumstances, the character of a renunciation of the contract, a repudiation of the contract, a refusal to fulfil the contract. It is just the reverse. The purchasers were desirous of fulfilling the contract; they were advised that there was a difficulty in the way, B and they expressed anxiety that that difficulty should be as soon as possible removed, by means which were suggested to them, and which they pointed out to the solicitors of the company.

The appellant company evidently took up the attitude of treating the default as one which released them from all further obligation. On Feb. 10, which was before the winding-up order was made, and while that state of things still continued, the C company by their secretary wrote to say that they thought (being so far correct, and thinking rightly) that the objection was not well founded in law; and they added:

“We shall therefore consider your refusal to pay for the goods already delivered as a breach of contract on your part, and as releasing us from any further obligations on our part.”

D I think that they were wrong in that conclusion; and that there is no principle deducible from any of the authorities which supports that view of such—I hardly like to call it a refusal—of such a demur, such a delay or postponement, under those circumstances. The appellant company, until they were wound-up never receded from that position; it appears to me to be clear that the liquidator adopted E it, and never departed from it, and that the repudiation of the contract on insufficient grounds on the part of the company, which had taken place while the petition was pending, and before the winding-up order was made, was adhered to after the winding-up order was made on the part of the liquidator. On the other hand, it seems to me that, fairly and reasonably considered, the conduct of the respondents was justifiable. Upon Feb. 17, 1881, after the making of the winding-up order, F they state that there are instalments which ought to have been delivered, but which had not been delivered, in respect of which they would have a claim for damages, and that they apprehend that they would have a right to deduct those damages from any payments then due from them; and according to the view I have expressed regarding the effect of s. 10 of the Act of 1875—in which view I believe your Lordships agree—that was the right way of looking at the matter. The respondents go G on to say that they are prepared to accept all deliveries which the liquidator may make under the contract, and to pay everything due, only requesting that those payments may be considered as made upon the understanding, in substance, that the right to the set-off which exists in law for the damages shall not be prejudiced—a perfectly reasonable defensible, and justifiable proposal.

H In my judgment, they have not in any portion of the proceeding acted so as to show an intention to renounce or to repudiate the contract, or to fail in its performance on their part. Therefore I think that the judgment of the court below is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I am of the same opinion. On the effect of s. 10 of the I Act of 1875 I will only say that I perfectly agree with what has been said by the Lord Chancellor.

As to the other point, I have no doubt that Withers v. Reynolds (2) correctly lays down the law to this extent, that where there is a contract which is to be performed in future, if one of the parties has said to the other in effect: “If you go on and perform your side of the contract, I will not perform mine” (in Withers v. Reynolds (2) it was: “You may bring your straw, but I will not pay you upon delivery as under the contract I ought to do. I will always keep one bundle of straw in hand so as to have a check upon you”), that in effect amounts to saying:

"I will not perform the contract." In that case the other party may say: "You have given me distinct notice that you will not perform the contract. I will not wait until you have broken it, but I will treat you as having put an end to the contract, and if necessary will sue you for damages, but at all events I will not go on with the contract." That was settled in Hochster v. De la Tour (3) in the Queen's Bench, and has never been doubted since; because there is a breach of the contract although the time indicated in the contract has not arrived. That is the law as laid down in Withers v. Reynolds (2).

That is, I will not say the only ground of defence, but a sufficient ground of defence. In Freeth v. Burr (1) it was also so laid down; and LORD COLERIDGE here thinks the facts were such as to bring the case within that principle. I will not at this time of the day go through them, but when the facts are looked at it is to me clear that that is not so. So far from the respondents saying that when the iron was brought in future they would not pay for it, they were always anxious to get it, and for a very good reason, that the price had risen high above the contract price. There was a statement that, for reasons which they thought sufficient, they were not willing to pay for the iron at present; and if that statement had been an absolute refusal to pay: "Because we have power to do wrong we will refuse to pay the money that we ought to pay," I will not say that it might not have been evidence to go to the jury for them to say whether it would not amount to a refusal to go on with the contract in future, for a man might reasonably so consider it. But there is nothing of that kind here. Theirs was a bona fide statement, and a very plausible statement. I will not say more. I refrain from weighing its value at this moment; but, as I said before, it prevents the case from coming within the authority of Withers v. Reynolds (2) and Freeth v. Burr (1), and, consequently, as I understand it, LORD COLERIDGE made a mistake in the ground on which he went.

The rule of law, as I always understood it, is that, where there is a contract in which there are two parties, each side having to do something (it is so laid down in the notes to Pordage v. Cole (4)), if the failure by one party to perform one part of it goes to the root of the contract, goes to the foundation of the whole, it is a good defence for the other party to say: "I am not going on to perform my part of it when that which is the root of the whole and the substantial consideration for my performance is defeated by your misconduct." But counsel for the appellants contended that whenever there was a breach of a material part of the contract it necessarily went to the root of the matter. I cannot agree with that. I quite agree that when there were a certain number of tons of the article delivered, it was a material part of the contract that the purchasers were to pay, but it was not a part of the contract that went to the root of the consideration in the matter. There was a delay in fulfilling the obligation to pay the money, it may have been with or without good reason (if that would have made any difference), but it did not go to the root or essence of the contract, nor do I think that there is any sound principle upon which it could do so. I repeatedly asked counsel whether or not he could find any authority which justified him in saying that every breach of a contract, or even a breach which involved in it the non-payment of money which there was an obligation to pay, must be considered to go to the root of the contract, and he produced no such authority.

There are many cases in which the breach may do so; it depends on the construction of the contract. With regard to Hoare v. Rennie (5) it has been said that POLLOCK, C.B., there went so far as to say that it was the essence and substance of the contract that the whole of the 166 tons of iron, and no less, should be delivered. If it was so, it would follow that, when in the present case the January shipment had not been made, and the company could only deliver part of the quantity, it went to the essence of the contract. The question depends upon whether the whole, and no less, is the essence of it. And again in Honck v. Muller (6), it is expressly and pointedly shown that that was the ground taken, and BRAMWELL, L.J., stated that in his opinion the contract of the one party was to deliver and of the other to take 2,000 tons of iron, and that, inasmuch as it was to

A be by three instalments and the first was gone and there never could be more than two-thirds of the quantity, the thing bargained for being the whole quantity of iron and no less, the defendant was not bound to deliver two-thirds when the plaintiff required the two-thirds only. Supposing that that was the true construction of the contract, I think that that would be the right conclusion. BRETT, L.J., seems, if I understand him rightly, to have thought that that was not the true construction of the contract—whether it was or not I do not express any opinion, except to point out that, whatever be the construction of other contracts, there is not in my mind the slightest pretext for saying that such is the construction of this contract, and, that being so, these cases have really no bearing upon the matter.

C The circumstances being as I have said, the contract not being such as to make this payment a condition precedent, or to make punctual payment for one lot of iron which had been delivered a matter causing the contract to deliver other iron afterwards to be a dependent contract, being of opinion that that is not the meaning of the contract, I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right.

D LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. I think it would be impossible for your Lordships to sustain the appeal unless your Lordships are prepared to hold that any departure whatever from the terms of the contract by one of the parties must be sufficient to entitle the other to set it aside. I think the correspondence shows that the delay in making payment of that part of the contract price which ought to have been paid on Feb. 5 was due to these two causes—in the first place, a very natural desire on the part of the purchasers to see that they were safe against being called upon to make a second payment of the price; and in the second place, an obvious desire on the part of the sellers to get rid of the contract altogether. E There was no controversy as to the terms of the contract. There was no unwillingness on the part of the respondents to pay the price due under the contract, except for the circumstance that there had been a change in the constitution of the company, because they had gone into liquidation on Feb. 2, and the respondents' firm were advised by their solicitor that they were not in safety to pay until the liquidator was appointed. That brings us down to Feb. 15. At that date the F company had given notice on Feb. 10 of their resolution to repudiate the contract in consequence of the failure of the respondents to pay, and to that repudiation the liquidator I think consistently adhered. In these circumstances it appears to me that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

G LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of the same opinion. LORD COLERIDGE says that the defendants, the present respondents, positively refused to pay for the iron already delivered, and for all which might be subsequently delivered. Whether, if they had positively refused to pay for that already delivered, it would have given any justification to the company or the liquidator for refusing to go on with the contract, it is not necessary for me to say at the present moment. I do not say that it would not; but, if they had positively refused to pay for all which might be subsequently H delivered, it would undoubtedly be an answer upon the authority of Withers v. Reynolds (2) and the reasoning which you have heard. But I really cannot, with great submission to the noble lord, find any evidence of that, and counsel for the appellants did not attempt to prove it, but he set up a new ground, which was that the payment of the debt due was a condition precedent to the further performance of the agreement, with which I cannot agree.

I I have one other word to say. I cannot tell why Honck v. Muller (6) and Houré v. Rennie (5) should be brought forward upon this occasion. I do not think that I said in Honck v. Muller (6) what in this case SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., supposed me to have said, namely, that "in no case where the contract has been part performed could one party rely on the refusal of the other to go on." If I did say so, I recall it, because I do not think so; it depends on the nature of the contract and the circumstances of the case. What I was busy upon in that case was in showing that there had been no performance at all there, and that in truth what the plaintiff was seeking to do was to make the defendant accept the performance of something entirely different from what had been agreed upon, and I think in that opinion I was right. But what has that to do with this case? Suppose I was wrong, what then? Suppose Honck v. Muller (6) was wrongly decided, how does it bear upon this case? Not in the least. Nor indeed does Hoare v. Rennie (5), which, in my opinion, was decided upon the considerations which I have mentioned, and which I think should be supported.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Winding-up—"Just and equitable"—Substratum of company gone—Petition within twelve months of incorporation.

Where it is proved that it is impossible for a company to carry out the objects of the company as stated in the memorandum of association, so that the whole substratum of the company is gone, the court will order, as being just and equitable, the company to be wound-up, even though the year in which it has to commence its business has not expired.

Company—Memorandum of association—General words—Construction—Ancillary to main object of company.

Where there are general words in the memorandum of association of a company, those words must be read, not widely, but as being ancillary to the main object of the company as stated in the memorandum.

Per BAGGALLAY, L.J.: Care must be taken to construe general words in a memorandum of association so as not to make them a trap for unwary people. General words, construed literally, may mean anything under the sun, but they must be taken in connection with that shown by the context to be the dominant or main object or objects of the company.

- SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This company, in my opinion, was formed, as the directors stated in their prospectus, “for the purpose of purchasing and working Henley’s German patent at Frankfort, to manufacture a partial substitute for coffee from the date fruit.” Of course, I do not use the prospectus for the purpose of interpreting the memorandum of association; I only use it to show that my construction is probably correct, because it is the construction adopted by the chairman and directors of the company after the incorporation of the company and before they issued the prospectus inviting the public to come in. The company is stated to be registered for several objects. The first object is to acquire a German patent granted to one Henley for manufacturing from dates a substitute for coffee. The second object is to make and use the said invention or any improvement. The second object only extends to any improvement or modification of the said invention. The third object is to adopt and carry out an agreement dated Feb. 16, 1881. This is an agreement for the sale of the German patent. The fourth object is to manufacture and sell the preparations which are the subject of the said invention. That is pure tautology. Nobody has been able to suggest that there is anything there which is not included in cl. 1 and 2. The fifth object is to grant licences. The sixth is to apply for and obtain patents for improvements or extensions of the said invention, and so on. The seventh is to acquire and purchase, or otherwise to use, exercise, and vend any other inventions for the above-mentioned or cognate purpose. All those are merely ancillary provisions. Then G there is the eighth object, which I read to be this, to import all descriptions of produce in connection with the above-mentioned purpose, or otherwise, for the purposes of the company. It never can mean to import and export food produce generally. That would be making the company a company for an entirely new and distinct purpose. But whether it is or is not the correct meaning, that object is merely ancillary. There are other provisions which do not apply to the subject-matter, although the twelfth is certainly an independent purpose.

- H That being so, it appears to me that this memorandum, when fairly read, and notwithstanding the rather loose use of general words, is simply to buy this patent, and to work it, either with or without improvements. That is the substance of the whole thing. I have no reason to doubt that the framers of the memorandum and articles believed that they would obtain the German patent. They were a little too sanguine, for they said, “for which a patent has or will be granted by the empire of Germany.” But they cannot complain, if, like those of other prophets, their prophecies are sometimes not verified by the result. It turned out that the German empire would not grant the patent. When that happened, what ought to have taken place? The answer would be: “The company cannot carry on business, and must be wound-up”; and that is exactly what KAY, J., ordered.

I There is an interim matter which ought not to be forgotten. A large number—in fact the majority—of the applicants for shares had their names taken off on the ground of deception. They understood from the prospectus that there was a patent when there was not. The number of shareholders left is very small, the holders of something like 13,000 shares in all—a very different company from what was proposed. It turns out that the company have done this quite bona fide, in anticipation of the granting of the German patent. They have established in Germany a factory for the manufacture of this substance called date coffee, and they say they have sold a good deal of it, and are doing a prosperous trade. They have also entered into an agreement with an English company called the “Date Coffee Co.,” by which that company has agreed not to compete with this company in Germany. A B

That being so, it seems to me, as the learned judge of the court below said, that the whole substratum of the company is gone. Its business was not to make a substitute for coffee from dates, but to work a German patented invention in Germany, to work it under the monopoly granted by the German government to the patentee, and not to enter into any such business generally. Therefore, the shareholders have a right to say—and the minority of the shareholders have a right to say: “We did not enter into partnership on these terms.” It is exactly like Baring v. Dix (1). It was a general partnership, not to make a substitute for coffee from dates, but to work a particular patent; and as that particular patent does not exist, and cannot now exist, they are entitled to say the company ought to be wound-up. It appears to me the learned judge in the court below has arrived at the right conclusion, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed. If the full effect of the general words were allowed, the company might carry on any business whatever. C D

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the principle involved in the decision in Re Suburban Hotel Co. (2) by LORD CAIRNS amounts to this, that, if you have proof of the impossibility of carrying on the business contemplated by the company at the time of its formation, that is a sufficient ground for winding-up the company. That gives rise in the present case to the question whether there was an impossibility in carrying out the objects of the company at the time the company was formed. I cannot entertain any doubt, having regard to the memorandum of association—and the view I take from a consideration of the memorandum is verified by the surrounding circumstances—that the real contemplated object was to carry out the manufacture of German date coffee to be manufactured from dates in Germany under a patent that was actually granted or was about to be granted. The contemplation of all the parties was that the granting of the letters patent in Germany for the working of this invention was the contemplated object of the company. E F G

No doubt in this case, and in many other cases, you have a variety of general words added, which, if they were to be construed by themselves, would give rise to giving power to carry on almost any business which might possibly be suggested. That has been guarded within certain limits, and those limits are, that the other objects must be regarded as ancillary to the purpose of the scheme for which the company was formed. It appears to me, from the memorandum of association, that the purpose of the company was the manufacturing of this coffee by virtue of a patent already obtained or to be obtained, and also any improvement that might be made by the patentee, or the company themselves, in connection with that particular patent. Is there an utter impossibility in carrying on the business of the company? It appears from the evidence that there is. There is this very strong evidence that the actual obtaining of these letters patent was contemplated by all the parties who took shares—that the holders of more than one quarter of the shares of the company, of 27,000 shares, directly they found it was not true that the patent had been already obtained (although possibly at that period it was not clear it might not be obtained) retired from the company. It appears to me, beyond all question, that there is an impossibility in carrying on the business of the company, and I think that the order appealed from is quite correct. I feel bound to add that I entirely agree with the learned judge in his enunciation of the law applicable to the case, and his criticisms. H I

A LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question we have to consider is: What is the fair construction of the memorandum of association? It is required by the Companies Act, 1862, that the memorandum shall state what the objects of the company are [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 2 (1) (c)]. In construing this memorandum of association, or any other memorandum of association in which there are general words, care must be taken to construe those general words so as not to make them a trap for unwary people. General words, construed literally, may mean anything under the sun, but they must be taken in connection with that shown by the context to be the dominant or main object or objects of the company. It will not do, under general words, to turn a company for manufacturing one thing into a company for importing something else, however general the words are. Taking that as the governing principle, it appears to me to be plain, beyond all reasonable dispute, that the real object of this company, which is called "The German Date Coffee Co., Ltd.," was to manufacture a substitute for coffee in Germany under a patent which is valid according to German law. All the rest is subordinate to that main object, and that is what the people subscribe their money for, although the words are general. I attach great importance to an observation made by counsel for the company as to the circumstance that this petition was presented less than a year after the formation of the company. Therefore, we ought to be careful in considering what ought to be done under those circumstances, because the Act of Parliament gives the company a year to see whether it can get to work or not. The language of s. 79 (2) of the Companies Act, 1862, is that a company may be wound-up by the court "whenever the company does not commence its business within a year from its incorporation, or suspends its business for the space of a whole year" [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 222 (c)]. That, I understand, is to give the company time. Supposing that there was no evidence which was tolerably conclusive to show that the company had failed within a year, the company would be entitled by statute to a year. The shareholders would be entitled to it. But where we have to deal with a case in which it is apparent, within a year, that the whole thing is abortive—that the company cannot acquire that which it was intended to acquire, and cannot carry out the object for which it was formed—the Act of Parliament does not require you to wait a year, and the case is then brought fairly within the words of the fifth paragraph of the same subsection: "whenever the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound-up" [s. 222 (f) of the Act of 1948]. I proceed now to the next head—whether the petition, having been presented within the year, the evidence shows that the objects for which the company was formed cannot be attained. To my mind, the evidence is overwhelming. The company have tried to get this patent and have failed, and the only point which appears to me to require any further investigation is that there is even now an application to the government for a patent. I have looked at that a little closely, and my opinion is there is nothing in it at all. It appears to me, therefore, that the judgment appealed from is perfectly correct, that the facts warrant the judgment pronounced, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Judicial Separation—Permanent alimony—Deed of separation—Power to vary sum provided by deed.

The husband's adultery with one K. was condoned by his wife, but, differences between them having subsequently arisen, the parties separated, each party by the separation deed covenanting not to take any steps to compel the other party to resume cohabitation and that neither party would molest or interfere with the other, and the husband covenanted to pay for the wife's benefit an annuity of £252. The husband afterwards renewed his adulterous connection with K., and on the ground of this adultery the wife obtained a decree for judicial separation. On an application by the wife for an inquiry as to the husband's means with a view to obtaining an order for the payment of a larger sum by way of permanent alimony,

Held: in the case of a judicial separation the court had no power to set aside or vary a separation deed, which, therefore, remained binding on the parties, and in the present case, the husband's conduct not being such as to disentitle him from relying on the deed, the court could not order the payment of a larger sum by way of permanent alimony than that provided by the deed.

Notes. This case was criticised—rather strongly by some of the Law Lords—in Hyman v. Hyman, [1929] All E.R.Rep. 245, where it was held that a wife could not by her covenant in a deed of separation preclude the court from exercising its jurisdiction to make provision for her on the dissolution of her marriage, but, as was pointed out in that case, the two cases are distinguishable, Hyman v. Hyman being a case of divorce and Gandy v. Gandy being one of judicial separation.

Appeal by the husband, Maurice Gandy, from an order made by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in a suit for judicial separation directing that the husband's means should be ascertained for the purpose of fixing the permanent alimony to which the wife, Elizabeth Gandy, claimed to be entitled.

B The wife and the husband were married at Liverpool on Nov. 11, 1854. There were five children of the marriage, three of whom, a son and two daughters, were under age at the date of the filing of the petition. Some time before the year 1879 the husband committed adultery with one Anne Kelly. The wife discovered the adultery, and consulted a solicitor as to taking proceedings for a divorce or judicial separation, but ultimately condoned the adultery and lived with the husband for some time. Differences, however, arose between them, and the parties separated.

C By a deed of separation, dated June 26, 1879, and made between the husband, of the first part, the wife, of the second part, and two trustees, of the third part, after reciting that unhappy differences had arisen and that the husband and wife had agreed to live separately from each other for the future and to enter into the covenants therein as contained, the husband covenanted with the trustees that his wife might at all times thereafter live separate from him, freed from his control and authority, and that he would not compel her to live with him or take any steps for that purpose, and would not in anywise molest or interfere with her, and, further, that any real and personal property to which the wife should become entitled should be held by her for her separate use as if the husband were dead.

D The husband also covenanted during the continuance of the deed, and if the wife should survive him, then during her life (subject to the due performance of the covenants therein contained), to pay to the trustees for the use of the wife and her daughters other than the two youngest daughters the annual sum of £252 by monthly payments of £21 in advance. It was further provided that he would pay to the trustees all the expenses connected with the maintenance and education of the two youngest daughters, provided that the trustees should permit the said daughters to go to such school as the husband should direct, and that the wife should not be entitled to the custody of those children, but that they should live at such reasonable and proper place or places as the husband should direct, and should be maintained and educated at his expense, the wife having all reasonable access to and intercourse with them. The husband was also to have the custody and control of the son. The trustees covenanted to indemnify the husband from his wife's debts and liabilities or those of her daughters (except the expenses connected with the maintenance and education of the two youngest daughters) or otherwise from all annoyance or molestation on the part of the wife or her daughters, and also that the wife, or any person on her behalf, should not at any time thereafter commence or prosecute any suit or other proceeding for compelling the husband to allow her any support, maintenance, or alimony, except as aforesaid, or to cohabit or live with her.

E After the execution of this deed the husband again committed adultery with Anne Kelly, and in December, 1880, the wife filed a petition for a judicial separation, on the ground of the adultery committed after the execution of the deed. On July 30, 1881, the case was tried before SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., without a jury, and his Lordship found that the adultery had been committed, decreed a judicial separation, and ordered that the wife should have the custody of the youngest children. The husband made no default in payment of the sums covenanted to be paid by the separation deed. It was admitted that at the date of the decree the husband was in possession of a much larger income than at the date of the separation deed. After the trial the wife applied for an order that the husband's means should be ascertained by the registrar with a view to fixing the permanent alimony to which she would be entitled. The registrar refused to inquire into the husband's means, and ordered a sum for permanent alimony equal to the annual sum which the husband had covenanted to pay. The wife took out a summons in chambers A to rescind the registrar's order. The summons was heard by the President on Dec. 20, 1881, when he made the order from which the husband appealed.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This case raises a point which is at once novel B and important. There was a separation deed entered into between the husband and wife after the husband had committed adultery to the knowledge of the wife, and had thereby caused quarrels which led to acts of legal cruelty by the husband towards the wife. The origin of the separation was the adultery of the husband and by the separation deed the husband, not then having made so large a fortune C as he afterwards made, agreed, after making provision for the maintenance of the children, to allow his wife £252 a year, while she agreed not to commence or prosecute any suit or other proceeding for compelling her husband to allow her any support, maintenance, or alimony, except as aforesaid, or to cohabit or live with her.

At a subsequent period the husband renewed his intercourse with the woman with whom he had previously had intercourse, and the wife instituted a suit for D judicial separation and obtained a decree. She was entitled to institute this suit, because, as she said, she was deprived by the deed of the custody of her two younger daughters, who were to be maintained by the husband and kept at school, and she claimed the right to their custody and succeeded in obtaining it. Probably, considering the two younger children were girls, and that the mother was free E from blame, it would have been impossible to interfere so as to prevent her from commencing and continuing her suit to a successful conclusion, having regard to her rights with respect to those children, and having regard to the benefit of the children themselves. But the husband remained liable under the deed, and is still liable to the maintenance of those younger children.

There is another motive, which, to my mind, is very plain, for the institution of these proceedings. It appears that the husband was the author of an invention, F which turned out to be very successful, and by which he made a very considerable fortune. It appears to me obvious that the fact of this accession of fortune was also an inducement to the institution of this suit for judicial separation on the part of the wife, and, after arrangements had been made as to the custody and maintenance of the children, an application was made for further alimony on the part of the wife, which application was granted in substance, though not in form, by the G order appealed from. I say "in substance," because the case was argued merely on the question whether the court should be put in possession of the facts as regards the husband's fortune before coming to a conclusion, but it was argued on the assumption, which, of course, was well known to all parties to be the fact, that the husband's fortune had become considerably larger than it was before, and that, H if the wife succeeded in the application as to the means of the husband, she would succeed in the application for an increase of alimony. On that footing the learned judge of the court below decided that, by reason of the subsequent adultery of the husband, the wife was entitled to obtain a larger sum in the shape of alimony than the £252 allotted to her by the deed.

The question is whether that was a right exercise of the discretion on the part of the learned judge of the court below, having regard to the facts I have mentioned. I The first point to be considered in this matter is that the contract made by the deed of separation cannot be affected by the subsequent adultery of the husband. He is liable under the covenant whether he commits adultery or not, and, in fact, he would be liable under the covenant even if the wife had committed adultery. That is settled law. The legislature has not thought fit, in the case of judicial separation, to give the same powers to the court that it has given in the case of dissolution of marriage. In the case of dissolution of marriage the court has had conferred upon it the right to vary, not only post-nuptial, but ante-nuptial settle-

A ments, and, therefore, to deal with them in any way which it may be thought just and expedient to do. But in the case of judicial separation, there being no such power, the deed remains binding. The wife is entitled to the annuity secured her by the deed; the husband is liable to pay the annuity. It is impossible, therefore, for the court to allot such alimony as it may think just, because, in the case of its thinking that the amount of alimony should be less than the annuity secured by the deed, it has no power of setting aside the deed, and no power to stop an action brought by the trustees upon the covenant in the deed.

B It is, therefore, a case where the ordinary powers of the court cannot be exercised except in one direction, namely, by increasing the amount of alimony. That being so, we must consider whether the contract can be interfered with by the court in the exercise of a discretion except when one of the parties to the contract has so acted as to disentitle him to rely upon the contract at all. I am not saying there may not be such a case; on the contrary I can quite conceive such a case. But unless you come to that, why should the court interfere with the contract at all? I see the learned judge put it upon the ground of public policy. I have explained more than once—and especially in Besant v. Wood (1), that there is no reason more dangerous to give than, and no reason on which such difference of opinion exists as, that of public policy. He has said:

“If you do not allow the wife to ask for increased alimony in such a case as this, you allow the husband to commit adultery with impunity.”

I am by no means prepared to say that is right. It is not impunity simply because he is not obliged to pay more money. I do not consider that is the only punishment for adultery, if the word “punishment” should be used in connection with it. No doubt he may be, to some extent, relieved from that liability; but this is a contract by which he is compelled to pay an amount having regard to his then state of fortune, and that may be much larger than it afterwards becomes, for his fortune may diminish.

F It does appear to me a very strong thing to say that, by his committing an act which does not affect the wife, either directly or indirectly, her rights to participate in his fortune should be altered. In the present case, how is the position of the wife affected at all? She was separated de facto et de jure before the institution of the suit. Her maintenance was the same whether her husband did or did not live with another woman. Her rights, in every respect, remained unaltered. It might be said, no doubt, that, in one sense, her position was affected, inasmuch as it was less probable that he would return to cohabitation. But people who execute deeds of separation of this kind are not presumed to assume that the return to cohabitation is very probable. It does not appear to me, looking at what occurred before the separation, considering the age and respective positions of the parties, and considering what the husband has done since, that you can say he is in such a position as to have forfeited all his rights, leaving him subject to all the liabilities under the deed. It seems to me that, having regard to the relative positions of the husband and wife, there has not been such misconduct on the part of the husband so affecting the position of the wife as to entitle her to repudiate the contract she entered into. Therefore, the contract is still binding, and the appeal must be allowed.

I COTTON, L.J.—In this case there has been an application by the wife under which she has obtained a reference to ascertain what is the income of her husband, for the purpose, avowedly, of obtaining maintenance otherwise than under the deed of separation.

I do not intend to give any opinion whether a court of equity would, under the circumstances, have enforced this covenant against the wife, because it appears to me not to be necessary to decide it, though I am far from saying that a court of equity would not, in former days, have interfered by injunction to restrain such an application by the wife as this. But the learned judge seems to have decided the matter on principles that would lead to the conclusion that the deed was bad altogether at law (which it is not), because, he said, this deed must be read subject to an implied condition that it should be operative so long as the parties should live chastely, and that to hold that the husband was right would be to say that this deed contemplated and allowed adultery on his part. I cannot agree with such a conclusion. The question has been whether, under the circumstances, the misconduct of the husband is such misconduct towards the wife as, having regard to the circumstances known to her at the time the deed was entered into, entitles her to say that this covenant is not to be regarded as an obstacle in the way of the application for alimony. Whether you are to take it that the application is made under the statute to give her such allowance as is just, or independently of the statute, the question is the same.

In my opinion, unless the conduct of the husband has been such since the deed as entirely to prevent him from using the deed in answer to the application of the wife, it must be taken into account, whichever way you look on it, in ascertaining—even if the application were not restrained by a court of equity—what allowance is just to be made. Here, however, the deed did not contemplate or provide for future adultery, but the conduct of the husband towards the wife is of the same character and nature as that of which she was aware when she entered into the deed. It is not suggested that there was any misrepresentation to her which would induce her to take this £252 as an allowance. It is said, and it seems to me to have some bearing on the case, that she has two children with her whom she had not before. But that is not so. The husband still remains liable, by the covenant, to provide for the two younger children, and they are still left at the school pointed out by him. The wife is only to have them during the holidays, leaving her husband still liable for their maintenance and making due provision for them.

In my opinion, the conduct of the husband since the deed is not such as, having regard to what was known to the wife at the time she entered into the deed, to disentitle him from relying on this deed. I put it that way, because I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that we ought not to say—and I do not entertain the opinion—that there can be no misconduct on the part of the husband such as would disentitle him to set up a deed of separation of this kind when the wife is making an application for increased allowance. Morrall v. Morrall (2), one of the cases referred to by the learned judge as leading to the conclusion at which he arrived, is an instance. There there was a deed of separation, with a provision as to what maintenance the wife was to have. She subsequently ascertained that the husband was living in incestuous adultery, a fact hitherto unknown—that is to say, there had been no incestuous adultery at the time the deed of separation was entered into. That may well be such a circumstance, such gross future misconduct, misconduct of a nature so entirely different from that for which the parties were providing when they entered into the deed of separation, as to prevent the husband from in any way relying on the deed, or rendering it just that the wife should disregard the bargain she made for maintenance in this application to the court for allowance by way of alimony to be made to her. Here, in my opinion, the circumstances are not such as to entitle the wife to disregard her bargain.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question we have to consider can be put somewhat in this shape—whether there has been any sufficient reason given for holding the wife discharged from her covenant not to sue for further alimony. Prima facie, she is bound by that. She is bound by it in all the courts at law, in the Divorce Court, and in this court, whatever difficulty there may be about specific performance or injunction. It is a perfectly good covenant. The order appealed from does not give effect to that covenant, but sets it aside, and the question is whether, under the circumstances, that is right.

The statutory power of dealing with this question of alimony is given by s. 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [see now Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 20 (2)]. This being only a suit for judicial separation, the power of the Divorce

- A Court over the deed is much less than it would be if this were a suit for divorce. It is a much more restricted jurisdiction and power, and it appears to me that other cases, of which Morrall v. Morrall (2) is one, where the Divorce Court had power to deal, in cases of divorce, with separation deeds, and to set them aside, are rather misleading when they are sought to be applied in a case where the court has no such extensive jurisdiction. Section 17 enables the court, on the application
- B of the wife, to make any order for alimony which "shall be deemed just." The word "just" must be taken to mean "just under the circumstances in each particular case"; one of the most important circumstances in any case is the bargain between the parties, and, if the parties have agreed that a certain sum shall be sufficient, prima facie that is just, and prima facie the court cannot either exceed or diminish it. I doubt very much, too, whether in any circumstances the court
- C could, under the language of the section, say that to order less than £252 was just. I do not think the section goes that length. If that is so, the analogy between the statutory power of dealing with alimony under s. 17 and the statutory power of dealing with separation deeds on the dissolution of a marriage fails altogether. It is limited in one direction and not in another, if s. 17 is to be read in the way it appears to me to have been read by the learned President of the court below. It
- D strikes me that, on the whole, the case is reduced simply to this, whether there has been, on the part of the husband, no misconduct towards the wife except adultery with another woman, and no apparent reason whatever, now that we understand the position of the children, for this lady to seek judicial separation as a means of getting further alimony, and whether, under those circumstances, the mere fact of the adultery is sufficient to deprive the husband of the benefit of the stipulation as to alimony. I do not think it is, and, therefore, I agree with the other members
- E of the court that the order appealed from must be discharged.

A bankrupt, having fraudulently realised the greater part of his property available for distribution, opened an account with the proceeds at a bank. Having entered into a contract for the purchase of some houses under an assumed name, he paid a deposit to the defendant, an auctioneer, by means of a cheque drawn on the bank, but the purchase was not completed. The defendant and the vendor acted throughout bona fide and without knowledge of the bankruptcy or of the bankrupt's fraudulent conduct. On a claim by the trustee in bankruptcy to recover the deposit from the defendant,

Held: the trustee was not entitled to recover the deposit since it had become forfeited to the vendor on the non-completion of the contract.

Case Stated by order of HAWKINS, J., under the Common Law Procedure Act. 1860.

James Chisholm Wilson, of Swindon, was adjudicated a bankrupt by the county court of Wiltshire, on Sept. 20, 1882, and the plaintiff, Collins, was, on Oct. 4, 1882, appointed the trustee of his estate. On Aug. 26, 1882, Wilson, having secretly realised the greater part of his available property and effects, absconded from Swindon, taking with him a large sum of money in bank notes and gold, the proceeds of such realisation, and opened an account at the London and South Western Bank (Clapham Branch). While in London, Wilson, on Oct. 10, 1882, in the assumed name of John Watson, and purporting to act for and as the agent of Miss Mercy Tomkinson, but in fact (although unknown to the defendant, Stimson, an auctioneer, or the vendor) acting on his behalf, entered into an agreement in writing with the vendor for the purchase from him of house property at Wandsworth, Surrey, for £950. At the same time Wilson paid to the defendant £95, being a deposit of 10 per cent. on the purchase money, this sum being paid to the defendant as stakeholder under the agreement. This payment was made by Wilson by means of a cheque, signed in the name of John Watson, on the Clapham Branch of the London and South Western Bank, which was duly paid by them. Neither the defendant nor the vendor knew, nor had they or either of them any reasonable means of knowing, at the time of the agreement being entered into nor at the time

A of the payment of the deposit, that the person representing himself as John Watson was in fact one and the same as Wilson; nor that Watson was a bankrupt, nor that he had secretly realised any of his available property, nor that he had absconded with a sum of money in bank notes or gold, which were the proceeds of the secret realisation; nor that the sum of money so paid by John Watson was part of the same, nor that he was contracting on his own account and not on behalf of Miss Tomkinson. The defendant and the vendor acted throughout bona fide in the ordinary course of business. The purchase of the property not having been completed in accordance with the agreement, the vendor, on Jan. 2, 1883, commenced an action against Miss Tomkinson for specific performance of the agreement, which was discontinued on his learning the true facts. The plaintiff, as trustee in Wilson's bankruptcy, brought the present action to recover the deposit paid by C Wilson to the defendant, and the vendor interpleaded, claiming to be entitled to the deposit as the contract of sale had not been completed.

Lamaison for the plaintiff.

Temple Cooke for the vendor.

D POLLOCK, B.—I have come to the conclusion that the defendant is entitled to judgment. The facts of the case show that Wilson was an absconding debtor who had realised and taken away with him a large sum of money available for distribution among his creditors. It also appears that subsequently Wilson, while at large, was introduced to the defendant under the assumed name of Watson, and entered into an agreement with the vendor for the sale and purchase of certain houses of which the vendor was the owner, and who was carrying out the transaction through E the agency of the defendant, an auctioneer.

The law is well understood that the auctioneer on the completion of a sale, whether by auction or private contract, acts as agent for both parties, that is, represents the interests of both parties, and cannot part with the money paid to him without regard to the interests of both parties: SUGDEN, VENDORS AND PURCHASERS, (14th Edn.), pp. 42–43. In the present case, the actual purchaser, Watson or Wilson, who had paid to the defendant the 10 per cent. deposit money, could not carry out the contract, and the defendant, on being sued for this money, paid it F into court. The question is, whether the plaintiff, the trustee in bankruptcy of Wilson, can follow this specific sum of £88 5s. 10d. on the ground that it is money belonging to the estate of the bankrupt.

G The case was very clearly argued by counsel for the plaintiff, and, as far as his argument goes, I am quite with him. I think this case is within the principle of Taylor v. Plumer (1), and that the money is sufficiently earmarked so as to be followed by this court, acting on the common law doctrine. Under the more refined doctrine of equity, explained in Re Hallett's Estate, Knatchbull v. Hallett (2), I agree that the trustee could follow it. That doctrine goes to the extent of saying H that, if the contract had been completed, the fruit of the contract could have been followed. In that case, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (13 Ch.D. at p. 711):

I "I have only to advert to one other point, and that is this—supposing, instead of being invested in the purchase of land or goods, the moneys were simply mixed with other moneys of the trustee, using the term again in its full sense as including every person in a fiduciary relation, does it make any difference according to the modern doctrine of equity? I say none. It would be very remarkable if it were to do so. Supposing the trust money was 1,000 sovereigns, and the trustee put them into a bag, and by mistake, or accident, or otherwise, dropped a sovereign of his own into the bag. Could anybody suppose that a judge in equity would find any difficulty in saying that the cestui que trust has a right to take 1,000 sovereigns out of that bag? I do not like to call it a charge of 1,000 sovereigns on the 1,001 sovereigns, but that is the effect of it. I have no doubt of it. It would make no difference if, instead of one sovereign, it was another 1,000 sovereigns; but if instead of putting it into his bag, or after putting it into his bag, he carries the bag to his bankers, what then? According to law, the bankers are his debtors for the total amount; but if you lend the trust money to a third person, you can follow it. If, in the case supposed the trustee had lent the £1,000 to a man without security, you could follow the debt, and take it from the debtor. If he lent it on a promissory note, you could take the promissory note; or the bond if it were a bond."

This would apply to the present case if this money had been deposited in a clear and unmistakable manner with the bankrupt's bankers, or had been put on loan, or if the property had been a mere chattel, as a horse left with a livery stable keeper, and the plaintiff would be entitled to take it.

The bankrupt entered into this contract, one of the conditions of which was, that if he, the bankrupt, did not carry it out, he should forfeit the deposit money. Can anyone say that such forfeited money could be recalled, as though it were money merely paid into a banker's? I think not. This was a perfectly good contract, and it was an essential part of it that the deposit money should be forfeited under certain conditions; the bankrupt has so neglected or failed to complete. It is admitted on the part of the plaintiff that, had there been a good consideration on the part of the bankrupt, he could not have got the deposit money back, and it is argued on behalf of the defendant that his position could not be altered to his disadvantage. This condition of forfeiture is of the essence of the contract. This makes the case an exception to the general rule, and there is evidently no case which would enable us to show that money burdened with such a condition could be so recovered as is here sought to be done. I am of opinion that judgment must be for the defendant.

LOPES, J.—The question is whether the plaintiff, the trustee in bankruptcy, can recover this sum of money. It is perfectly clear that the money could be followed under ordinary circumstances. But this money placed on deposit was the price paid for the contract. In consequence of entering into this contract, the vendor was induced to alter his position, and incur certain expenses. I cannot distinguish this contract from the purchase of a horse or an ordinary chattel by a bankrupt, in which case the purchase money clearly could not be followed by his trustee in bankruptcy. I think that the defendant is entitled to keep this money.

Judgment for the defendant.

Sale of Land—Restrictive covenant—Building estate—Land sold subject to covenant—Breach—Defence—Alteration of character of neighbourhood—Acquiescence by plaintiff.

A building estate was laid out in lots, which were sold to different purchasers, each of whom covenanted with the vendor and with the owners of the other lots not to build a shop on his land, or to use his house as a shop, or to carry on any trade therein. The plaintiff, purchaser of one of the lots, who occupied his house as a private residence, brought an action against the defendant, purchaser of another lot, to restrain him from using his house as a beershop with an off-licence. The defendant had, to the knowledge of the plaintiff, so used his house for three years before the action was commenced, and the plaintiff had for some time bought beer from his shop. In an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using his house as a beer shop, evidence was given that several other houses built on other lots had for some time been used as shops, and that many of the houses adjoining the plaintiff's house were occupied, not by a single tenant, but each by two families at weekly rents.

Held: the mere alteration of the character of the neighbourhood was not sufficient ground of itself to refuse the plaintiff relief as there was no evidence that the alteration was caused by his conduct, but there was such an amount of acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff as to bar him from enforcing his rights.

Notes. The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858 (Lord Cairns' Act), remained in force notwithstanding the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. Section 2 of the 1858 Act gave the court of Chancery power, in all cases in which it had jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act or an application for specific performance, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for an injunction or specific performance. This section was repealed by the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, s. 3, Sched. (repealed), but by s. 5 of the 1883 Act the repeal did not affect the jurisdiction established by the repealed enactment. A similar saving was contained in s. 1 of the Statute Law Revision Act, 1898, which repealed the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, s. 5. By the combined effect of the foregoing savings and of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 16 (repealed and replaced by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 18), which vested the jurisdiction of the court of Chancery in the High Court, the jurisdiction conferred by the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, s. 2, remains in force. Since the Judicature Acts, the High Court has power to award damages to a party who has been injured, either in addition to, or in substitution for an injunction. It is therefore no longer necessary in such a case to resort to s. 2 of the 1858 Act.

A Appeal from a decision of PEARSON, J., reported 24 Ch.D. 180, at the trial of an action for an injunction, damages, and costs for the breach of a restrictive covenant in conveyance of plots of land on a building estate.

At the beginning of the year 1874 the British Land Company purchased a considerable quantity of land at Leytonstone, in Essex, and, after selling part of it by auction in March, 1874, proceeded to divide the remainder into building plots, and
B dispose of the same by private sales to different persons, the conveyances being in each case taken subject, by reference, to certain stipulations appearing on the margin of a lithographed plan of the entire property, and affecting the different plots in such manner as was deemed necessary, the plots being for this purpose formed into a number of blocks or groups, according to their relative situations. One of these blocks, comprising plots Nos. 424 to 445 inclusive, was in this manner
C rendered subject, upon the sale of any part thereof, to the following stipulation, among others:

"Trades, etc., prohibited. No building shall be erected or used as a shop . . . nor shall any trade or manufacture be carried on or made upon any lot."

After one or two mesne assurances plot No. 440 became vested in the plaintiff
D Sayers, and plot No. 445, about 98 feet distant from No. 440, became vested, in April, 1879, in the defendant, whose immediate predecessor had bought it in April, 1878, direct from the company, the conveyance upon this sale containing the following clause:

"And whereas the premises were sold to the purchaser subject to the stipulations specified in sched. 2 which refer to the said lithographed plan, now, therefore, the vendors (as to so much of the land to which the said stipulations relate as remains vested in them) for themselves and their assigns, and the purchaser (as to the land hereby conveyed) for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, do respectively covenant and grant with and to each other, and as to the purchaser also with and to the owners or owner of any
F other land to which the benefit of the said stipulations is attached, and their, his, or her respective heirs or assigns, that the convenantors respectively, and their respective heirs and assigns, will henceforth observe, perform, and comply with the said stipulations so far as the same relate either to the rights or to the duties of the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, in respect of the land hereby conveyed, and that nothing shall ever be erected, fixed, placed, or done upon the
G land as and to which they respectively covenant in breach, or violation, or contrary to the fair meaning of the said stipulation, but this covenant is not to be held personally binding upon either the vendors, or the purchaser, or any other person, except in respect of breaches committed or continued during their, his, or her joint or sole seisin of or title to the land upon or in respect of which such breaches shall have been committed."

H The defendant's predecessor, during his ownership of plot No. 445, built upon it a house, which the defendant himself, upon his purchasing the plot, was the first person to occupy. This house was, from the first, built to all appearance as a public-house, and not as a private residence. It was in fact bought as such by the defendant, who at once, in May, 1879, proceeded to take out an off-licence, and from that time forward continued to sell beer accordingly. It was not disputed
I that the defendant was aware throughout of the existence of the above-mentioned restrictions upon the mode of user of the house; nor, on the other hand, was it disputed that the plaintiff was throughout also aware that beer was being sold by the defendant. It appeared, indeed, that, although the plaintiff Sayers, according to his own statement, very early remonstrated with the defendant's managers against the sale of beer, he nevertheless took no active steps to stop such sale, but was in fact contented for about nine months to purchase his own beer from the defendant, and made no real objection to the defendant's conduct until the beginning of 1882. His explanation of this delay was, that soon after his purchase of his plot he mortgaged it and parted with the deeds, and that until the mortgage was paid off and the deeds returned to him, he had no accurate knowledge of his rights. A

The defendant relied on the acquiescence of the plaintiff Sayers and also urged that the character of the neighbourhood had altered, and that it could no longer be considered as purely or essentially residential. There was evidence that several other houses, built on other plots, one immediately opposite the plaintiff's house, had been for some time used as shops, and many of the houses adjoining the plaintiff's house were occupied, not each by a single tenant, but by two families at weekly rents. B

The action was commenced on Mar. 2, 1882, the British Land Co. being made co-plaintiffs with Sayers and the claim being for an injunction, damages and costs. PEARSON, J., at the trial, held that the character of the property had become so changed that the original purposes of the covenant had failed, and that it would therefore be inequitable to enforce specific performance of the covenant. The plaintiffs appealed. C

Everitt, Q.C., and E. Ford for the plaintiff.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Farwell, for the defendant, were not called upon.

BAGGALLAY, L.J., stated the facts of the case, and continued: A number of cases have been cited in the course of the argument, but they are of very little importance for the decision of this case, except as enunciating the principles on which the court ought to act, for each case must be determined according to its peculiar circumstances. The authorities establish the principle that there may be such an amount of acquiescence as will bar the right of a covenantee to enforce his covenants. I mean acquiescence as distinguished from delay, for a much shorter period is sufficient to bar the enforcement of rights in the case of acquiescence than in a case of mere delay. D E

The question here is whether, in the circumstances of the present case, there has been such an amount of acquiescence as is sufficient to preclude the plaintiff from enforcing his covenant. In my opinion, the evidence does show such an amount of acquiescence as to bar the plaintiff from enforcing his rights. The sale of beer by the defendant began in 1879, only a few doors from the house where the plaintiff lived, and went on till the commencement of the action, and during some part of that period the plaintiff himself bought beer at the defendant's house. We can hardly imagine a stronger case of acquiescence than this. It was not a public-house in the ordinary sense of the words. The defendant sold beer to be drunk off the premises; people bought it and took it away to their own houses. PEARSON, J., appears to have held that the case fell under the doctrine of Duke of Bedford v. British Museum Trustees (1), the character of the neighbourhood having been changed. But I do not take quite the same view of the case. Within certain limits, no doubt, that authority has an application to the present case, but I do not decide it upon that ground; I prefer to base my decision on the ground of acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff. F G H

PEARSON, J., also thought that in consequence of the change of condition of the neighbourhood he ought not to grant the injunction, but that the court had a discretion under Lord Cairns' Act to grant damages instead of an injunction, and being of opinion that the plaintiff had sustained no substantial damage, he dismissed the action altogether. Various comments have been addressed to us on Lord Cairns' Act, and it has been contended that it is not applicable to cases where the damages are nominal only. I cannot accede to that view. If it were so held, the result would follow that, if a plaintiff had sustained damage to the extent of £20, the Act would apply, but if he had sustained only a farthing damages it would not apply, and the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction. This is surely inconsistent with the purposes of the Act. I

Our attention was called to the fact that Lord Cairns' Act has been repealed since the former hearing of this case, being included in the schedule to the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, but that Act contains words preserving the

A jurisdiction of the court notwithstanding the repeal. By s. 5 it is enacted that any jurisdiction or principle or rule of law or equity established or confirmed, or right or privilege acquired, by or under any enactment repealed by the Act, shall not be affected by the repeal. It is not, however, necessary to have recourse to Lord Cairns' Act, for it is clear that the court now has power to give damages as alternative relief. Before Lord Cairns' Act was passed a plaintiff who wished to enforce
B a restrictive covenant had two remedies: he might come into a court of equity for an injunction to restrain an infringement of his right, or he might have recourse to a court of common law to obtain damages, and Lord Cairns' Act gave the courts of equity the power of giving a plaintiff damages by way of alternative relief; but since the Judicature Acts each division of the court has ample power, apart from Lord Cairns' Act, to give either an injunction or damages. However, the ground
C of my decision is, that there has been such an amount of acquiescence in the present case as to bar the plaintiff from enforcing his covenant. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree that the true ground for deciding this case is not the mere fact of an alteration in the proprietary character of the neighbourhood. Duke of Bedford v. British Museum Trustees (1) must not be misunderstood or misapplied. It is not an authority that contractual obligations disappear as circumstances change, but that a person who is entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant may by his conduct or omission put himself in such an altered relation to the person bound by it as makes it manifestly unjust to insist on its enforcement. It was decided, I take it, on equitable grounds. In such a case there is an equity
E against the plaintiff which bars his relief. In the present case we do not decide that a mere alteration in the character of the neighbourhood would be sufficient, because there is no evidence that such alteration was caused by the plaintiff; but the true ground of our decision is, that the plaintiff's conduct amounts to acquiescence. He has no right to come here for an injunction after the way he has behaved towards the defendant.

PEARSON, J., dealt with the case under Lord Cairns' Act. He held that it was a case in which he ought to refuse an injunction, but that he had a right under that Act to grant damages instead, and, as he assessed the damages at one farthing, he dismissed the action altogether. Counsel for the plaintiff complained bitterly of this treatment of the case by the learned judge; they said that the court elected to treat the case as one of damages, and then gave no damages at all, and they contended that the Act did not apply to such a case as that. But it is obvious that the Act applies with double force to cases where only nominal damages could be given. Otherwise this absurd result would follow, that if a plaintiff is entitled to substantial damages the court could refuse him an injunction; but if he had no real cause of complaint, and the damages could not be assessed even by a peppercorn, he would have a right to an injunction. In other words, as his damages decreased to zero his
H right to an injunction would correspondingly increase. That is so absurd a proposition that I cannot believe that it was intended by the legislature.

I think, therefore, that PEARSON, J., was right in treating the case as coming under Lord Cairns' Act. I doubted at first whether he ought not to have given nominal damages and no costs. But my doubt has been removed by the consideration that the plaintiff would not be entitled to 40s. damages for breach of covenant, or to a certificate for costs, unless he had suffered tangible damages, or unless he was justified in bringing his action to ask for a declaration of title or to try a right. But here the plaintiff has suffered no material damage, and he has no right to bring an action and ask for a declaration of title against the present defendant. If he had not behaved to the defendant as he did, there would have been no reason why he should not have had his right declared by the court. But the acquiescence which disentitles him from an injunction also precludes him from obtaining a declaration of title, and makes it a frivolous action. I think, therefore, PEARSON, J., was right in dismissing the action.

FRY, L.J.—I agree in what has been said on the first question. I agree that the rule in Duke of Bedford v. British Museum Trustees (1) is not applicable to this case. It applies where an alteration takes place through the acts or permission of the plaintiff Sayers or those under whom he claims, so that his enforcing his right becomes unreasonable. But I do not think it applies to cases where the change which has taken place was beyond the control of the plaintiff. Therefore I think, although we have not heard the defendant on the point, that the learned judge was not right in applying the principle of that case to the present. A

But I agree that the action must be dismissed on the ground of the acquiescence of the plaintiff. Acquiescence may either be an entire bar to all relief, or it may be a ground for inducing the court to act under the powers of Lord Cairns' Act. Although I do not differ from what has been said by BAGGALLAY, L.J., I am inclined to prefer the other ground, and think that this is a case in which the plaintiff's acquiescence would have induced me to give damages instead of an injunction. C

It was argued that Lord Cairns' Act is not applicable to cases where nominal damages only could be given, but only to cases where the damages are substantial. It would be astounding if, as BOWEN, L.J., said, the effect of the Act were to be that the right to an injunction increased as the right to damages decreased, and that the right to an injunction became absolute when the damages were zero. In my opinion, the Act applies to cases where the damages are merely nominal, and I am clearly of opinion that acquiescence is one of those circumstances which the court may well take into consideration in deciding whether it should give damages or an injunction, and that an amount of acquiescence less than what would be a bar to all remedy may operate on the discretion of the court, and induce it to give damages instead of an injunction. Therefore, without differing from the other lords justices, I prefer to rest my decision on that ground. D

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Baggallay and Lush, L.JJ.), December 1, 1881]

Time—"Forthwith"—Construction according to circumstances of case.

An order of a county court was made on July 12, 1881. Notice of appeal was entered on the last available day, Friday, Aug. 5. By r. 144 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, the appellants were required to send a copy "forthwith" to the registrar of the court appealed from under the appropriate rules. At least three hours elapsed between the time when the notice of appeal was entered on Friday and the last post on that day, but it was not until the following day, Saturday, that the appellants' solicitor posted a copy of the notice to their country agents. The agents received it on the Monday, and delivered it the same day to the registrar. If the copy of the notice had been posted on Friday, it would have been delivered to the registrar on the Saturday.

Held: the word "forthwith" must be construed according to the circumstances of each case; the question in the present case was whether the appellants had been guilty of unreasonable delay; and, as the delay had not been explained, it was unreasonable.

Appeal by the trustees in bankruptcy of T. W. Southam from a decision of BACON, C.J., dismissing an appeal (on the ground that it was out of time) by the trustees from an order of Manchester County Court refusing an application by them that the respondents should deliver up certain property claimed as part of the bankrupt's property.

The order in bankruptcy was made by the judge of the Manchester County Court on July 12, 1881. The trustees in bankruptcy appealed to the Chief Judge. A Rule 143 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, provided :

"An appeal against a decision or order of . . . a judge of a county court shall be entered with the registrar of appeals within and not later than twenty-one days from the said decision or order, by leaving with him a copy of the appeal notice of motion." B

By r. 144 :

"Upon entering an appeal a copy of the appeal notice shall be sent forthwith by the appellant to the registrar of the court appealed from, who shall forthwith file the same." C

The copy of the notice of appeal was entered on Friday, Aug. 5, which was the last of the twenty-one days allowed, but a copy was not posted to the solicitors of the trustees in Manchester till the evening of Aug. 6. It reached them on Monday, Aug. 8, following, and was on the same day left with the registrar of the Manchester County Court. BACON, C.J., held that the copy notice was not sent to the registrar "forthwith," and that the appeal was out of time. The trustees appealed. D

Smyly for the respondents.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—I am of opinion that the word "forthwith" must be construed according to the circumstances of each case. A covenant to insure a man's life forthwith does not mean that the insurance is to be effected in an instant. In the present case the question we have to decide is, whether the trustees have been guilty of an unreasonable delay in sending a copy of the notice of appeal to the county court registrar. The trustees did not choose to enter their appeal till the very last day allowed for the purpose. They knew that, as it was a country case, they must send a copy of the notice to the registrar in the country. The meaning of the rule is, that an appellant must enter the appeal in the country as well as in London, so that a respondent may search in the country without coming to London or instructing his London agent to search. We do not know at what time on Friday the appeal was entered, or what was the exact time when the trustees might have sent it off on that day. All we do know is, that the country solicitors of the trustees did not get the notice till Monday morning. There was some delay, therefore, and under all the circumstances, that delay not being explained, I am of opinion that the rule has not been complied with. E F G

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons expressed by the Master of the Rolls.

LUSH, L.J.—I agree that the word "forthwith" must be construed according to circumstances. We have not been told why the copy of the notice of appeal was not sent into the country by Friday night's post. The appeal notice was not sent within a reasonable time. The trustees lost at least three hours from the time when the office of the registrar of appeals closed till the last post. I think the decision of the Chief Judge was right and should be affirmed. H

Appeal dismissed. I

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Grove and Mathew, JJ.), June 21, 1882]

B Master and Servant—Contract of service—Termination—Appointment as "engineer . . . at a salary of £500 per annum"—Yearly hiring—No express or implied stipulation as to notice.

A hiring "at a salary of £—— per annum" is prima facie a hiring for a year certain, and cannot be determined by either party before the end of the year unless the agreement of hiring is subject to some stipulation, either express or implied by custom, enabling either party to determine the contract by notice.

C The plaintiff was employed as engineer to the defendants at a salary of £500 a year, and was dismissed at a three months' notice.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to recover salary for the unexpired portion of the year.

At a meeting of the directors of the company held on Aug. 23, 1880, the plaintiff was appointed the engineer by resolution to the following effect:

H "Resolved that Mr. J. Buckingham be appointed engineer to the company at a salary of £500 per annum."

I This resolution was confirmed at a subsequent meeting of the directors. The plaintiff entered the employment of the defendants, and on Feb. 23, 1881, he received a three months' notice to determine the engagement on May 23, 1881, which he refused to accept, and continued after its expiration to tender his services to the company, which were rejected. Thereupon he brought this action for the recovery of the quarter's salary from May 23, 1881, to Aug. 23, 1881. The defendants did not offer any evidence as to any custom, and HUDDLESTON, B., directed a verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the engagement was prima facie an engagement for a year certain. The defendants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

McIntyre, Q.C. (Hilbery with him), for the plaintiff.Reginald Brown for the defendants.

GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. Here the evidence was that, by a resolution of the directors which was duly confirmed, the plaintiff was appointed engineer to the defendant company at a salary of £500 per annum. As a general rule, where the hiring is a yearly hiring, it cannot be put an end to by either party before the end of the year. This rule, however, is subject to an exception in cases in which the agreement of hiring is subject to some stipulation, either express or implied by custom, enabling either party to determine the contract by notice. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, no evidence was offered on behalf of the defendants of any custom to determine such a hiring as this by a three months' notice. It seems to me, therefore, that the judge was bound to direct the jury that in the absence of any such evidence the hiring was a hiring for a year. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff accepted the engagement upon any other terms than those expressed in the resolution. The plaintiff established a prima facie case of a yearly hiring, and, therefore, in the absence of any evidence of custom to rebut that prima facie case, I think the verdict ought to stand.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

- C Appeal by the trustee in bankruptcy from the refusal of Mr. Registrar PEPYS to make an order under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 90, for payment to the trustee of income, of which it was alleged the bankrupt was in receipt.

- The adjudication took place in January, 1880. The bankrupt was what is popularly termed a "bone-setter," and many persons resorted to him for surgical treatment in consequence of his high reputation for skill in dealing with certain kinds of injuries. He continued his practice after the adjudication, and it was alleged that his yearly earnings averaged £1,500. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869:

- "Section 89. Where a bankrupt is or has been an officer of the army or navy, or an officer or clerk or otherwise employed or engaged in the civil service of the Crown, or is in the enjoyment of any pension or compensation granted by the Treasury, the trustee during the bankruptcy, and the registrar after the close of the bankruptcy, shall receive for distribution among the creditors so much of the bankrupt's pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension, as the court, upon the application of the trustee, thinks just and reasonable, to be paid in such manner and at such times as the court, with the consent in writing of the chief officer of the department under which the pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, pension or compensation is enjoyed, directs.

- F Section 90. Where a bankrupt is in the receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid, the court, upon the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of such salary or income, or of any part thereof, to the trustee during the bankruptcy, and to the registrar if necessary after the close of the bankruptcy, to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

- G Cooper Willis, Q.C., and J. E. Palmer for the trustee.
T. L. Wilkinson for the bankrupt.

- SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—The bankrupt in this case, Mr. Hutton, carries on business as a surgeon, not in the sense of being a member of the College of Surgeons, but as what is popularly called a bone-setter. In carrying on that business he exercises great and well-known skill. What he does is all done by means of his own personal skill and knowledge, and all the emolument which he receives is earned by means of his own personal skill and knowledge. He does not sell anything. It is not like such a case as, for instance, that of a cabinet-maker, who I no doubt adds very greatly to the value of the materials on which he works by the skill which he possesses, but who sells a cabinet, and not his own skill. We are asked to make an order, not dealing with anything in possession, or with anything to which the bankrupt is entitled under any contract, which in the phraseology of the law would be called a chose in action, but dealing with the proceeds of personal skill which has not yet been exercised—that is, with future income which he will or may earn.

It is said that he earns an average income of £1,500 a year, but there can be no certainty that he will continue to earn this in future. I am of opinion that what may or may not be earned in the future is not property which passes to the trustee. A One might as well say that, if a father promises to his son that he will leave him something by his will, that could be dealt with as property if the son were to become bankrupt in his father's lifetime. Certain kinds of property are referred to in s. 89 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and I think that s. 90 was intended to deal with something similar. In cases coming within s. 89 the bankrupt is entitled to receive the "pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension" which is to be dealt with, and it seems to me that emolument in that section is something ejusdem generis with pay, half-pay, and salary. All these things are something which it is certain that the bankrupt will have, and, therefore, power is given to the court to deal with them for the benefit of the creditors. Section 90 goes further than s. 89, but I think that "salary, or income, other than as aforesaid," in s. 90, must be something of the same kind as the other matters referred to in the preceding section, according to the ordinary rule that where particular words are used in an Act of Parliament, and are followed by general words, these general words are only to be held to include that which is ejusdem generis with what is denoted by the particular words which have gone before. B C

If this be so, it follows that although "income," within the meaning of s. 90, is neither pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, nor pension, within the meaning of s. 89, still must be something which is in the nature of salary. Therefore, what we are really asked for is an order to deal with what Mr. Hutton will earn in the future, on the ground that it is an income of the same kind as a salary. It is only necessary to state the case to show that it is not anything of the kind. For these reasons I am of opinion that the case is not within s. 90, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed. D E

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the refusal of the registrar to make an order under s. 90 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The trustee asks for an order dealing with future property which may or may not be earned, and we have to decide whether such a prospective order ought or ought not to be made. What the bankrupt had at the time of the bankruptcy was only his personal skill and knowledge, by means of which, if people consulted him, he would be enabled to earn money, and the capacity to earn money is not, in my opinion, property which passes to the trustee. There is nothing in the nature of property and there are none of the things described in s. 89, nor anything of a similar nature. I am, therefore, of opinion that s. 90 does not enable the court to make a future order. In cases which come within s. 89 there is a right to receive the pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension, and I think that s. 90 deals with similar matters to those dealt with by s. 89. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that we ought not to apply the provisions of those sections to contingent and uncertain income, which may or may not be earned, for the court cannot force a man to go on with his practice and earn an income for the benefit of his creditors, if he does not wish to do so. I think, therefore, that the registrar was right. Apparently such an order as is now asked for has never been made under circumstances such as those of the present case. The income which the bankrupt earns is derived from his own skill in performing surgical operations, not from skill in making up materials. F G H

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the present case does not come within s. 90. It is the case of a man earning fees by carrying on a profession or business, and his income is necessarily precarious, and is not like a pension or salary. We are asked to impound the future earnings of the bankrupt. If we were to make any such order it could be evaded, for he need not see patients or earn fees if he did not wish to do so. I am, therefore, of opinion that, under ss. 89 and 90, precarious income cannot be seized. It is said that there is authority the other way, and we are referred to Ex parte Huggins (1), where it was held that a government pension came within the provisions of s. 90. I think that case is an illustration of I

A what s. 90 was intended to meet. The decision in Emden v. Carte (2) does not, I think, touch the present point. For the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that the case is not brought within s. 90. It is certainly somewhat remarkable that this question now arises for the first time.

Appeal dismissed.

Nullity—Incapacity of husband—Presumption—No consummation after three years—Estoppel—Approbation of marriage.

E In an action for nullity, if the parties have lived together for three years without consummation impotence on one side or the other will be presumed to be the cause, in the absence of other evidence, but this presumption may be rebutted by sufficient evidence. On the other hand, if permanent impotence is clearly proved by affirmative evidence, a decree may be pronounced though the parties have not cohabited for three years.

F The doctrine of "sincerity" in such an action does not go further than saying that there may be conduct on the part of the person seeking the remedy which ought to estop that person from having it, as, for instance, any act from which the inference ought to be drawn that during the antecedent time the party has, with a knowledge of the facts and of the law, approbated the marriage, or has taken advantages and derived benefits from the matrimonial relation which it would be unfair and inequitable to permit him or her, after having received

G them, to treat as if no such relation had ever existed. The husband and wife were married in November, 1877, and resided together until they finally separated in June, 1879. In 1883 the husband commenced proceedings for divorce on the ground of adultery, and the wife then instituted proceedings for a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of the husband's impotence.

H Held: (i) the pendency of the proceedings for divorce was no bar to the action for nullity; (ii) the action was not brought after an unreasonable delay; (iii) a triennial cohabitation was not necessary before commencing the suit, there being sufficient affirmative evidence that the husband was impotent.

Appeal from a decision of the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (the Lord Justice Clerk (LORD MONCRIEFF), LORD YOUNG, and LORD CRAIGHILL, LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK dissenting), reversing a decision of the Lord Ordinary (LORD KINNEAR) in an action brought by the respondent (the wife) against the appellant (the husband) for a declaration of nullity of marriage by reason of his impotence. E

The appellant and respondent were married in Bombay in November, 1877, he being at that time 49 and she being 20. They resided together in India until December, 1878, and afterwards in Scotland until June, 1879, when they finally separated. It was admitted that the marriage had never been consummated, and that after the early part of February, 1878, the appellant had made no attempt to do so. In October, 1882, the respondent gave birth to a child of which it was admitted that the appellant was not the father, and in March, 1883, he commenced proceedings for a divorce on the ground of her adultery. In April, 1883, she commenced the present action. F

Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., and Jameson (of the Scottish Bar) for the wife.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—In this painful case some questions of law, which are of importance in this sense, that if they could be established they would be important, have been argued as constituting a bar to the treatment of the question as one simply of fact depending upon the particular evidence in the particular case. My opinion is, that no law which can have that effect has been shown to exist in Scotland. H

The two points mainly insisted upon were derived, so far as they went, from the English, or partly from the English and partly from the canon law, authorities. And the first observation which I make is, that, if there be positive rules of law upon which an exception to the trial of an action of this kind upon its merits can be founded, they must be proved to exist and to be recognised as positive rules in the country in which the action is brought. Neither the doctrine which, in the language of some of the cases, may be described as the doctrine of "sincerity" on the part of the pursuer in an action of this kind, nor the doctrine of the necessity of triennial cohabitation, assuming those doctrines to exist and to be rules of positive law, in the sense suggested by the husband's counsel, in England, is proved to be recognised by the law of Scotland, or to be a rule of positive law in Scotland. from which country, this appeal comes to the House. I

A That might perhaps, be enough to dispose of all that has been said upon those subjects; because, although the law of Scotland and the law of England, so far as they proceed upon general principles of jurisprudence, are sufficiently alike to make it often useful to illustrate the one from the other when these principles are involved, yet that never can be said of positive rules of law, which may be described as being more or less of an arbitrary character. But it may not be improper to say
B one or two words with reference to the English authorities, because I think that those authorities themselves have probably been misunderstood.

It is, in my opinion, unfortunate that when an expression is used by a judge, however eminent, in explaining his view of a particular case, and the principles on which it ought to be dealt with, if that expression was not previously a vox signata, or technical term of law, it should be taken up by other judges as if it had either
C established or recognised a technical rule which did not otherwise exist. I asked counsel who was the first judge who used this word "sincerity" with regard to the subject in hand, and the answer was, that it was used by a judge of the greatest possible eminence in the ecclesiastical courts, no less a man than LORD STOWELL, who presided over those courts from 1788 till 1821. That would be a comparatively recent origin to which to ascribe a technical rule of law, and I cannot think that
D LORD STOWELL ever intended to lay down a technical rule of law which could rightly be interpreted, as in some very modern cases, or at least in one very modern case it has been interpreted (W. v. R. (1)) as meaning that a plaintiff bringing a suit of nullity of marriage must be actuated in his or her own mind so purely and simply by the purpose of obtaining relief from the grievance arising from the want of power said to be wanting in wife or husband as to have no secondary motive, or, in the words of the case to which I have referred, "no mixture of subsidiary motive."

With the greatest deference to any judge or judges who may have used such an expression, it appears to me that no such rule of positive law can be introduced in that manner by any judicial phraseology, except so far as it can be shown to be founded upon a just and intelligible principle. My own belief is, that to whatever criticism the phraseology of judges in those cases may be open (and I must say that the adoption of that particular phrase "sincerity" seems, as counsel said, to suggest a psychological question rather than one of law or fact, diving into the motives of a person's mind rather than trying whether a cause of action exists or not), I think I can perceive that the real basis of reasoning which underlies that phraseology is this, and nothing more than this, that there may be conduct on the part of the person seeking this remedy which ought to estop that person from having it; as,
G for instance, any act from which the inference ought to be drawn that during the antecedent time the party has, with a knowledge of the facts and of the law, approbated the marriage which he or she afterwards seeks to get rid of, or has taken advantages and derived benefits from the matrimonial relation which it would be unfair and inequitable to permit him or her, after having received them, to treat as if no such relation had ever existed.

That explanation can be referred to known principles of equitable, and I may say of general, jurisprudence. The circumstances which may justify it are various, and, in cases of this kind, many sorts of conduct might exist—taking pecuniary benefits for example, living for a long time together in the same house or family with the status and character of husband and wife, after knowledge of everything which it is material to know. I do not at all mean to say that there may not be
I other circumstances which would produce the same effect; but it appears to me that, in order to justify any such doctrine as that which has been insisted upon at the Bar, there must be a foundation of substantial justice, depending upon the acts and conduct of the party sought to be barred. Further than that, I do not think it necessary for the purpose of this case to go. Of course, where facts are in dispute, motive may be all-important; but that is not the case here.

If that be a true explanation of the doctrine, so far as it can be considered law in England (for into Scotland it never seems to have found its way at all), under the name of "sincerity," or under any name distinguishing it from "approbate and reprobate" and the general principles of equity, then I say that if this case had to be tried by that doctrine, the circumstances would show that it was inapplicable; for this lady, during the time that she and the husband lived together, never took or had the benefit of conjugal rights. The spouses separated within two years of the marriage, and the husband has never contributed to maintain the wife. So far as appears he has had no property at all. He could not even keep up the policy, which he had contracted to keep up by the marriage contract, and she had to do it out of her proper moneys, she being the person who contributed the whole of the property of the pair, and from the month of June, 1879, she has resided with her own family and friends, he doing nothing whatever, and she deriving no other benefit whatever from the assumed marriage relation except that she passed by his name. The result is, that there is no single circumstance of conduct, except those which go into the merits and the evidence bearing upon the principal question of fact, which, on a reasonable view of this doctrine of "sincerity," can be alleged against her.

It is said, and it is no doubt perfectly true, that this lady has a motive for desiring to obtain the relief which she asks, different from and in addition to that which would have existed if those circumstances had not happened which give its peculiar character to this particular case. The peculiarity is this, that the husband began by suing his wife for a divorce on the ground of adultery, and the wife had to defend herself against the husband's suit. One manifest defence, if it was open to her, was that she was not his wife, and she pleaded that defence. Undoubtedly it is quite true that she had a motive for asserting her right to be rid of him as her reputed husband, and to have the marriage declared void and null; she had a motive arising out of the situation in which she had unfortunately placed herself. The success of his action against her, depending entirely upon the relation of husband and wife, would have been in several respects prejudicial to her. In the first place, there would have been the stigma of adultery. To some minds it may appear to be a mere question of degree whether a woman is guilty of adultery or of incontinence; but by the letter of the law of Scotland it appears not to be clear that it may not be something more in that country. At all events a person feeling that difference has a motive, which in itself is an intelligible and innocent motive, for defending herself against that charge in any way which is open to her by law.

But that is not the only motive; her fortune, or at least the whole income arising from it during her life, would have been forfeited, by the law of Scotland, by the husband's success in that suit. That again depended entirely upon her being his wife. If she was not his wife, what more reasonable than that she should be permitted to plead it in order to avoid such a forfeiture, to which, in that view, she was not liable? Again, she is unfortunately the mother of a child of which her nominal husband is not the father. The status of that child is a legitimate subject of care and consideration to her. If she is not the wife of the present appellant, there is a possibility, at all events, of her marrying the father of the child, and the child, according to the law of Scotland, would then have the status of legitimacy. That is impossible if she is at present the appellant's wife. Can anybody say that those are motives of a fraudulent character, of a dishonest character, of a character from which there is some moral estoppel, unless there is a legal estoppel by some positive rule of law, to prevent her from acting upon them and getting the truth declared that she is not this man's wife, if in truth she is not? It appears to me that there is the utmost "sincerity," in a reasonable sense of the word, in a suit brought under those circumstances. She has the most cogent motives for asking a competent court to declare the truth—motives of an innocent, and to some extent of a laudable kind. I do not of course mean to say that it was innocent to place herself in the unfortunate position in which she has placed herself as the mother of that child; but being in that position, it is perfectly innocent to desire that the true character of her relation to the appellant should be ascertained by law, which depends upon the question whether she is the appellant's wife or not.

A Therefore, in the absence of any trace or scintilla of authority whatever from any Scottish source to the effect that this lady's suit under these circumstances is barred, or that the merits of the case are not to be inquired into, I think it would be impossible for your Lordships to reverse, on that ground, a judgment of the Court of Session which has determined that they are to be inquired into, and that they are in the respondent's favour.

B With regard to the second subject on which a question of law was raised at the Bar, namely, that of time, I will merely observe that what I understand all the authorities to say upon the subject of time is that time, like any other circumstance of conduct, is a very material element in the investigation of a case which upon the facts is doubtful. Where there is a controversy of fact, delay in bringing forward the case increases, in proportion to the length of that delay, the burden of proof

C which is thrown upon the plaintiff. But that there is any definite or absolute bar arising from a certain amount of delay is a proposition which, I apprehend, cannot be established either by any Scottish or any English authorities.

On this head the main point which was argued I really think depended upon a misconstruction of a rule recognised undoubtedly in the English courts—that is to say, recognised in the sense which I myself place upon it, but, as far as appears,

D not even to that extent recognised in Scotland—namely, the rule which had a very early foundation in the civil law, according to which two years, afterwards changed by JUSTINIAN to three years, was a fixed term for the purpose of raising a certain presumption. In the canon law that rule, for the purpose of raising that presumption, was recognised, but subject to this, that it was to take effect when the matter to be presumed ("frigidity" is the language of the canon) could not be proved

E before: Prius probari non possit.

That rule has, under certain limitations and in a certain sense, been recognised in the English courts by various authorities. It was explained by DR. LUSHINGTON, in the cases before him to which I shall have occasion to refer, not to be an absolute rule, because, on the one hand, when a three years' cohabitation had taken place, the inference to be presumably drawn from the absence of consummation within that time was capable of being rebutted; and, on the other hand, the rule did not exclude evidence to explain the same thing before, nor did it in any way exclude one kind of evidence for that purpose more than another. But the rule itself, as I understand it, has not been recognised either in Lewis v. Hayward (2) in this House, or by any other authority, beyond this point, that when you have a husband or a wife seeking a decree of nullity propter impotentiam, if there be no more in the evidence than that they have lived three years together, living, as I understand the word "cohabitation," in the same house and with the ordinary opportunities of intercourse, no explanation being given to rebut the presumption, if during that time the ordinary results have not followed—if, in point of fact, there has been no consummation, and that is clearly proved—then, if that be the

H whole state of the evidence, inability of the one party or of the other will be supposed to be the cause. But, as I said, that may be rebutted by evidence sufficient for the purpose; and on the other hand, upon that mere state of the facts, a presumption will not be raised from the expiry of a less period of time. But it may be, as DR. LUSHINGTON has said, uncontradicted by any other authority, and, as it seems to me, supported by what appears on the very face of the canon law which

I has been referred to, that though no presumption can be raised from the mere absence of the fact within a less period than three years, yet evidence may be given from which the same inference may be drawn, only it is not drawn by a presumption from a certain length of time, but it may be drawn from positive evidence.

That is a reasonable state of the law if the triennial rule, which as to the exact time fixed may be called arbitrary, is in force at all. In Scotland it does not appear that it has been recognised within recent times; and I think that the decisions of DR. LUSHINGTON upon this subject in the two cases U—n (falsely called

F—s v. F—s (3) and N—r (falsely called M—e) v. M—e (4) are perfectly reasonable and perfectly satisfactory. Now upon these cases I propose to say no more than this: in the first of them Dr. LUSHINGTON says (2 Rob. Eccl. at p. 618):

"I am of opinion that a triennial cohabitation is not an absolutely binding rule. It is a convenient and fitting rule, and one not to be departed from on slight ground; still circumstances may arise, as in the present case, to justify the court in dispensing with it. I am not aware that there is any magic in three years. I conceive that the object of the rule is to provide that sufficient time may be afforded for ascertaining beyond a doubt the true condition of the party complained of. If the court can be satisfied by circumstances that the complaint of the promoter of the suit is well founded, it never ought to be driven, sine gravissima causa, after such cohabitation as is proved in this case [which was less than three years], to order a return."

And in the other case he entered further into the matter, and distinctly held, upon evidence in my judgment not stronger than that in the present case, not only that there was no obstacle to granting, but that he was obliged to grant, a decree in favour of the promoter of the suit.

That is all that I think it necessary to say upon the subject of the points of law which have been argued; because the last argument which counsel for the husband with ingenuity as well as zeal advanced, namely, the argument that the lapse of the wife had produced an alteration of status which rendered her no longer able to bring this action, seemed to turn upon the most transparent fallacy possible. He seemed to me to think that a woman who was not in a situation to ask for a restitution of conjugal rights was not in a situation to say that she was not a wife. Why? To say that she is not a wife and to ask for a restitution of conjugal rights are absolutely inconsistent and incompatible things; she cannot do both, and therefore it is quite clear that, in order to obtain a declaration that she is not the wife, she is not only not obliged to ask, but she is not in a position to ask, for a restitution of conjugal rights. [His LORDSHIP then discussed the evidence in the case, and concluded.] The whole result, I think, is this: if a jury had had to determine the case upon this evidence, and had found as the court below have found, would it have been possible to say that that was a verdict which they were not justified in coming to? I think not; and being of that opinion, I cannot give my voice for reversing the decision to the same effect of the Court of Session. I therefore move your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session were right in holding that they were not precluded from considering the effect of the evidence upon the merits of the case, and also that they were right in holding that upon the evidence the wife was entitled to a decree.

The first plea against any consideration of the merits of this case was rested upon the rule as to "sincerity," or, more correctly speaking, "insincerity." I agree with the observations which have been made upon the English cases bearing upon that matter by the Lord Chancellor. It appears to me that the expression is not a very happy one, and also that it has been used occasionally in circumstances which render it still more inappropriate. I think that, when these cases are dissected, they do show the existence of this rule in the law of England, that in a suit for nullity of marriage there may be facts and circumstances proved which so plainly imply on the part of the complaining spouse a recognition of the existence and validity of the marriage as to render it most inequitable and contrary to public policy that he or she should be permitted to go on to challenge it with effect. If that be, as I am inclined to think it is, the rule of the law of England, I have no hesitation in saying that it is a rule which prevails in Scotland also. But if the English rule goes further, if it goes to the extent to which it has been pleaded on the part of the husband in this case, I have just as little hesitation in saying that it has no place, and is of no authority, in the law of Scotland. What has been

A contended for at the Bar comes to this, that wherever circumstances arise, before the spouse complaining of the impotence of the other has raised an action for the purpose of having the nullity of the marriage declared, which render it a matter of legitimate interest that the nullity should be declared, if these circumstances are what is called collateral to the marriage, all suit is barred. It is said that the addition of a strong and legitimate motive to that already existing, instead of strengthening, as I should have thought, the title of the pursuer in such a case, is to have the effect of cutting it down altogether.

The second ground upon which it was maintained that it was incompetent to deal with the evidence in this case, is the triennial rule as established in the canon law. No doubt there is not much authority to show how far that rule has been followed in practice in the law of Scotland; but, seeing that it is to be found in the canon law, and is in itself not an unreasonable rule, and has been so recognised in the jurisprudence of England, I have no reason to suppose that the courts in Scotland would hesitate to adopt it where it is applicable. But what is that rule as declared and established by the canon law? It simply raises a legal presumption that where two persons after solemnising a marriage live together and cohabit for a period of three years, and the lady is able to show that she is virgo intacta, that state of things, in the absence of rebutting proof on the part of the husband, will entitle her to have the nullity of the marriage declared. But it is one thing to have a rule establishing a presumption, and quite another thing to have a rule of positive law excluding all other evidence than that which is derivable from such a presumption. The contention at your Lordships' Bar has practically been that in certain circumstances, where the impotence complained of is of a peculiar character, you cannot regard evidence establishing it, and that no party can have a remedy against it unless he or she comes to the court justified by that presumption, even although the evidence should be in itself amply sufficient to convince every reasonable mind that the complaint is well founded. I have heard no authority for that. I do not think that any one of the English cases comes up to it, and if they did, I, for one, should not be prepared to adopt it as part of the law of Scotland. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt shortly with the evidence, and concurred with the Lord Chancellor.]

LORD BRAMWELL considered the evidence and continued: Then I will just say one word as to the point which was made about the wife disqualifying herself by her incontinence with some other man. Suppose that she had bona fide believed that the husband was dead, and had married another man, and had had a child, that would be no answer in England—I do not know how it would be in Scotland—to an indictment for bigamy; the punishment would be small, but it would be no answer to the indictment, and the child would be a bastard. But there would be no moral guilt. Could it be pretended that in that case she would have disqualified herself? Then what is the difference? The only difference is that in this case there is the guilt of incontinence. There is a moral guilt, which would not have existed in the supposed case. One word as to this question of "sincerity." It is a most remarkable expression, a very curious word, and I am not at all sure that it has not resulted from this, that sincerity is a very important matter in ascertaining whether the spouse complained of is impotent or not; and sincerity has been dwelt upon for that purpose, till at last it has been taken to be a separate head of objection to the complaining party's proceedings. It seems to me very strange. What the complainant does in a suit of this sort is to come to the appropriate court for a declaration of the truth: "I say that this man is impotent, and was so at the time of the marriage, and I ask you to declare that fact." The very words of the summons are: "Declare the truth, that this man was impotent when he married me." The court say: "No, we will not"; or the argument is, that the court ought to say: "No, we will not; we know that it is true, but we will not say so." Why? In my opinion a man who has inflicted this cruel wrong upon a woman ought not to be heard to object to her complaining when she comes forward with her complaint of this wrong that he has done her, unless, in some way or another, he can show that he sustains some injury from the double matter of her not having complained earlier, and of her complaining now. In such a case, I should indeed think that a law might be made (perhaps it exists for aught I know) that in some way or another the declaration of the truth should be accompanied by some compensation to him for the act of injury which, as I have indicated, might have been done to him. But supposing that there is such a rule or head of objection of want of sincerity—I do not know how to phrase it—in my opinion this case is not open to it. This woman comes here, driven by the conduct of the husband, for a reason which is, I think, perfectly intelligible. She puts up with the wrong which has been done to her by him until she is driven to bring this suit by his calling her an adulteress, and seeking a divorce from her, which divorce would be followed by a forfeiture of her property if he chose to insist upon it. I put it to counsel for the husband, supposing that, after a man and woman had lived together under these circumstances, he being clearly impotent, his regard for her, if he had any, had failed, and he had taken to beating and ill-using her, would it then have been open to the objection of insincerity if the woman had brought a suit for a declaration of nullity? Counsel argued that it would, and I do not see how he could argue otherwise. So that, supposing a woman was ill-used by having this gross injustice done to her, but, rather than complain of it, put up with it until her life was made intolerable by the misconduct of her husband, she could get no redress of it. I think it is impossible that that can be the law.

I will just add one word more about this matter. I really cannot understand how this husband can have done otherwise than welcome the suit which the wife has brought for the purpose of making her offence against chastity less grievous than it would have been if she had been his lawful and true wife. I cannot understand how he could have done otherwise than meet her eagerly, to have that decree pronounced which she was praying for, and atone to some extent for the wrong he had done her. It seems to me to have been a most cruel thing for him to have acted as he did. It is now twenty-five years since I delivered my opinion in Castleden v. Castleden (5). I think that I may claim credit for the possession of sufficient candour and sufficient self-denial to be able to say that, if I thought that judgment was wrong now, after twenty-five years, I could say, "Well, I was wrong then, but I know better now." But I have read it, and I will say that there is not one word which I uttered then which I would not repeat at the present moment; and it does seem to me that the judgment which was given in the Probate Court, and in this House (I say it with all submission), is a mixture of two things, either of which taken separately comes to nothing.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The procreation of children being the main object of marriage, the contract contains by implication, as an essential term, the capacity for consummation. There may be special circumstances in relation to the marriage of a character to deprive the parties, or one of them, of the right to be relieved on the ground of impotence. But there is no such special circumstance in the present case. The pursuer rests her case on the ordinary rule that she is entitled to be relieved if she can establish by reasonable and trustworthy evidence that the husband was at the time of the marriage impotent, and has remained so. The husband denies permanent impotence, and that is the real question now to be determined, and upon that question, from the beginning, I have held a very decided opinion. He further relies upon the supposed rule as to the necessity of triennial cohabitation, as to the want of promptness in instituting the suit, and as to insincerity, and the presence of a subsidiary motive.

I rest content entirely with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor as to these additional defences which the defendant seeks to raise; but I would add further that, even if the rule as to triennial cohabitation contended for by counsel for the husband existed in the law of Scotland, it would be totally inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case, and the special circumstances here would take it out of this

A rule if it existed. I can very well understand all these additional allegations coming in aid, and I take them in aid, upon the question of evidence. For instance, it was alleged that there was insincerity in this sense, that this lady had another motive besides a strong desire to be relieved from the tie of this marriage. She has the strongest of all motives, a motive so strong that I should be inclined to regard her evidence, if in its main features it was controverted, not alone with caution, but with suspicion. It is not only her eager desire to be relieved from this marriage tie, but further, she has to relieve herself from the charge of adultery; she has to protect her future, and to obtain a position which may enable her to relieve her child from the status of bastardy.

When all these circumstances are taken into account they would lead me to consider what has been so much contested in this case, not as indicating rules applicable to the special case before us, but as laying before us reasons why we should regard with caution the evidence given on behalf of the pursuer. Then the question, as I have thought from the beginning, and the only question in the case, is this: Is the evidence sufficient to establish a case of permanent impotence against the husband? There are certain statements of fact not controverted but admitted on both sides, and I take it that the Lord Ordinary was correct in saying that the real facts of the case, the real matters in proof, were not controverted, but there might be a great controversy as to what were the legitimate inferences to be deduced from the facts so proved. The question which we have to consider is, what is the reasonable inference to be deduced from the facts absolutely established? What are we to deduce, having regard to the ordinary experience of life, and applying common sense to the facts which are before us?

E Before dealing with these facts, I will, in a very few words, advert to one other matter which counsel for the husband brought before us. He relied upon the unwillingness of the pursuer to continue cohabitation. No doubt she did exhibit, after a certain period, the strongest unwillingness, and I would ask, how could it be expected to be otherwise? For two months she had submitted to what I should call treatment degrading in the highest degree, and she certainly would not have had the feelings of a woman if she had been willing that that treatment should continue. Again, it is said that she made no complaint; but is that statement well founded? Why, from the time of the abandonment of his marital rights by the husband her life has been a protest. Not only can it be said that there has been complaint, but through the whole of her married life there has been a protest against the condition into which she had fallen. [HIS LORDSHIP then discussed the evidence, and continued:] It is said that the pursuer ought sooner to have instituted the suit. I ventured to observe in the course of the case, and I repeat it now, that there is not one of us who cannot recall to memory the experience of some case in which a woman submitted to the worst of treatment, treatment degrading and humiliating, and allowed it to continue rather than permit her name to become the subject of a public scandal; and probably this lady would have submitted to much more if she had not been driven to her present course by the institution of the action for divorce. Upon these grounds I entirely concur in your Lordships' judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

Action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for damages for the loss of goods deposited with defendant which had been destroyed by fire.

- D It was alleged in the statement of claim that the defendant agreed with the plaintiff that the defendant should remove from 319, Caledonian Road, Islington, certain goods and stock in trade of the plaintiff, and that the defendant should warehouse the same at his repository in Kingsland Road, and should insure the goods against loss or injury by fire; and in accordance with this agreement the goods were delivered to the defendant in ten cases to be so deposited at his repository and to be there safely kept and taken care of by the defendant for reward.
- E Subsequently the plaintiff found the goods were not insured, and therefore relying upon the defendant's representation that they were in the defendant's repository, he insured the ten cases of goods on his own behalf, describing them as being upon the premises at Kingsland Road. At the time the defendant represented the ten cases to be at Kingsland Road, two had been removed to certain stables in Fanshaw Street, Hoxton, by the defendant, contrary to the agreement and without the
- F knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. On or about Oct. 14, 1880, a fire occurred at the stable in Fanshaw Street, and the two cases of the plaintiff's goods were destroyed. The plaintiff further alleged that in consequence of the defendant's negligence and false representation the plaintiff lost the two cases of goods and the use and value of them, and had been unable to recover the value from the insurance office and claimed £300 damages.

- G The defendant in his defence denied that it was agreed that he should warehouse the goods at Kingsland Road or in any particular repository, but contended that the goods were delivered to him upon the terms that he should be at liberty to warehouse them at any one or more of his repositories as might be feasible and convenient, and it was not feasible and convenient to warehouse all the goods in Kingsland Road, and therefore two cases were warehoused at the defendant's
- H premises, as the plaintiff well knew. With regard to the agreement to insure alleged by the plaintiff, the defendant denied that any such was entered into between them, and said that the plaintiff asked him as a matter of favour to insure the goods, and he took steps to do so; but the plaintiff subsequently withdrew his request and authority, and expressly forbade the defendant to insure them, alleging that he, the plaintiff, had himself covered the goods by all necessary insurance
- I against loss or injury by fire; and the plaintiff knew at the time that two of the cases of goods were at Fanshaw Street.

The jury found that the defendant had agreed to warehouse the goods at his repository in the Kingsland Road, and also that the plaintiff had not assented to their being removed to Fanshaw Street or elsewhere and the plaintiff moved for judgment.

GROVE, J.—In this case, although everything has been said which could be said in support of the defendant's contention, I cannot agree with it. The first point is this. A person who has been entrusted with goods to put them in a particular place takes them to another place, and therefore he is responsible for the consequences, or rather for what has occurred at that place, and which in all probability would not have occurred had he put them in the other place. The only exception is that which was put by counsel for the defendant during the course of the argument, and that is where the cause of destruction is one which must take place at one place as much as another; as for instance, if a bailee, for hire, of a horse which happens to be diseased, having hired the horse for the express purpose of going to Greenwich goes to Richmond, and the horse dies and would have died from the disease in whatever direction he had gone of an equal distance, the bailee would not be liable. But if the owner of property gives another person authority to deal with it and points out the particular way, and such person chooses to deal with it in another way, he must take the risk of the consequences, whether the injury or destruction is caused by the act of a third party, or, as it is called in law, by the act of God.

I think that this view is fully supported by Davis v. Garrett (1). That was a case where the plaintiff had put on board the defendant's barge lime to be conveyed from the Medway to London. The master of the barge deviated unnecessarily from the usual course, and during the deviation a tempest wetted the lime, and the barge taking fire the whole was lost, and it was held that the defendant was liable, and the cause of loss sufficiently proximate to entitle the plaintiff to recover under a declaration alleging the defendant's duty to carry the lime without unnecessary deviation and averring a loss by unnecessary deviation. The second point held in that case is, that the law implies a duty on the owner of a vessel, whether a general ship or hired for the express purpose of the voyage, to proceed without unnecessary deviation in the usual course.

Counsel for the defendant argued that this was a case of a common carrier who is an insurer, but I find that it was not decided on that ground. In the judgment of TINDAL, C.J., he says (6 Bing. at p. 723):

"But the objection taken is that there is no natural or necessary connection between the wrong of the master in taking the barge out of its proper course and the loss itself; for that the same loss might have been occasioned by the very same tempest if the barge had proceeded in her direct course."

Here the defendant's duty was to fulfil an express contract with the plaintiff, and if he gives him authority to put the goods in one place he has no right to take them to another. TINDAL, C.J., goes on to say (ibid.):

"But if this argument were to prevail, the deviation of the master, which is undoubtedly a ground of action against the owner, would never, or only under very peculiar circumstances, entitle the plaintiff to recover. For if a ship is captured in the course of deviation no one can be certain that she might not have been captured if in her proper course. And yet in Parker v. James (2), where the ship was captured whilst in the act of deviation, no such ground of defence was even suggested. Or, again, if the ship strikes a rock or perishes by storm in the one course, no one can predicate that she might not equally have struck upon another rock, or met with the same or another storm if pursuing her right and ordinary voyage. The same answer might be attempted to an action against a defendant who had by mistake forwarded a parcel by the wrong conveyance, and a loss had thereby ensued; and yet the defendant in that case would undoubtedly be liable. But we think the real answer to the objection is, that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong; and that as a loss has actually happened whilst his wrongful act was in operation and force, and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss, if his wrongful act had never

A been done. It might admit of a different construction if he could show not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done; but there is no evidence to that extent in the present case."

B There was no fire in the Kingsland Road, and the defendant, without authority, or I may say in direct defiance of authority, and without asking the plaintiff, removed the goods to Fanshaw Street, therefore he must take the consequences. I do not give any opinion as to whether this amounted to a conversion or not, and it is not necessary to decide that and to go through all the cases counsel for the defendant has cited. It is undoubtedly, to my mind, a wrongful act, not authorised by the owner, and on that ground I think he cannot set up a defence which, as C TINDAL, C.J., says in Davis v. Garrett (1) (6 Bing. at p. 724), would "qualify his own wrong." I don't think Hadley v. Baxendale (3), and similar cases, are decided on the same ground. There was only one case which made an impression on my mind, and that was Hobbs v. London and South Western Rail. Co. (4). That case, I am told, has had some doubt thrown on it in a recent case in the Court of Appeal, McMahon v. Field (5). At all events I don't think that the former case is expressly in point. It does not seem to me that I should make the matter more clear by going into all the cases, and distinguishing them; and on the grounds I D have stated I think judgment should be entered for the plaintiff.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is reduced to a very small point. The plaintiff gave his goods to the defendant to be warehoused at a particular place, and the defendant, for reasons good, bad, or indifferent, takes them E to another place. Counsel for the defendant says there is no cause of action, but that there was a breach of contract is very plain, and the question is what consequences must follow. Then he says that the damage was too remote, and no doubt that is an argument which requires attention, but Hadley v. Baxendale (3) and such cases are applicable to circumstances wholly different from these. I do F not say whether what was done here amounted to a conversion, as it is not necessary to decide that. I think the true measure of damages must be the value of the goods, and Davis v. Garrett (1) and Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co. (6) seem to show this. In the latter case it was this: the defendant contracted to supply the plain- G tiff with a proper pipe to convey gas from the main outside to a meter inside his premises. Gas escaped from the pipe into the plaintiff's shop, and the servant of a gasfitter employed by the plaintiff and who happened to be at work in another room at the time of the escape, went into the shop upon hearing it with a view of finding out its cause. He was carrying a lighted candle, and immediately upon entering the shop an explosion took place, doing damage to the plaintiff's premises and stock; the jury found that there was a defect in the pipe when it was supplied by the defendants, and also that there was negligence on the part of the man who H carried a lighted candle into the shop. It was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and the defendants were not relieved from responsibility by the negligent act of the gasfitter's servant. In that case the damage was not considered too remote, nor do I think it is in this.

I STEPHEN, J.—My view of the case is so entirely the same as that expressed by my brothers GROVE and LINDLEY that I do not think it necessary to add much to what has been said. But it has seemed to me throughout that the case is reducible simply to this. You go and place my goods in a place where you have no authority to put them and they are destroyed, therefore you must pay for them. I do not think the question of contract makes any difference. Whether this was a conversion or not I do not express an opinion, as it is not necessary; and with regard to Hadley v. Baxendale (3), it appears to me that it is not a case in point. Cases of that kind are not applicable where the contracting party has dealt with the goods contrary to authority, but where he has failed to do what he has agreed to do. As I have said, it is simply a case of the defendant having taken the plaintiff's goods to a place where he had no right to take them, therefore he must pay for their loss, and I think judgment must be entered for the plaintiff. A

Will—Codicil—Revival—Codicil mistakenly drawn as codicil to previously revoked will.

In 1877 a testator made a will disposing of all his property. In 1878 he made a subsequent will, also disposing of all his property, and, therefore, by implication revoking the first will. In 1880 he executed a codicil, which by error was expressed to be a codicil to the 1877 will, and referred to provisions in that will not included in the later will. E

Held: the codicil must be taken to revive the earlier will, and, as the later will contained dispositions which had not been revoked, both wills and the codicil should be admitted to probate, leaving the effect to be determined, if necessary, by a court of construction. F

Probate Motion to determine which testamentary dispositions of John Stedham should be admitted to probate.

John Stedham, deceased, duly executed two wills and a codicil, the contents of which, so far as they are material to the present inquiry, are sufficiently set out in the judgment. I

R. A. Bayford applied for probate of the later of the two wills only with the codicil.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10, 1881. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P.—The testator in this case made a will in May, 1877, by which, after making certain devises to each of his six children, he directed the residue of his real and personal estate to be sold and divided equally among those children. By another will, executed in February, 1878, he

- A directed the whole of his real and personal property to be sold and divided equally between his six children, but with the direction that, in the case of two of them, certain arrears of accrued rent should be deducted from their shares. In January, 1880, he proposed to make a codicil which should deprive these two children of any share in the property, which was to be divided into four shares instead of six. The solicitor who was instructed to prepare this codicil made it a codicil to the will of 1877 instead of a codicil to the will of 1878. I was asked to treat this as a mere mistake, and to allow probate of the codicil with the will of 1878; but I do not feel able to do so, since not only was there a mistake as to the date, but the mind of the solicitor, which constituted for the occasion the mind of the testator, was applied to the provisions of the will of 1877, which he moulded into what he conceived to be the intention of the testator at the time when the codicil was made. If I were to
- C allow probate of the codicil with the later will only, I should introduce nonsense into the two instruments, for the codicil refers to provisions in the will which would not be found there. It is always difficult to apply any principles of law to a blunder; but, after giving my best consideration to the matter, I have arrived at the conclusion that, since the codicil refers to the will of 1877, it must be taken to confirm it, and bring it into existence. It is, therefore, necessary that the earlier
- D will should be included in the probate, so that the codicil may have an interpretation put upon it; but since the will of 1878 contains the most important dispositions of the testator, and these have never been revoked, this will must also be admitted to probate, leaving the effect of all the instruments to be determined, if necessary, by a court of construction; but in order to prevent litigation, I may say that the interpretation I should put upon these three instruments is that the two children
- E have been entirely excluded from the testamentary dispositions of the testator, and the whole of the property is to be divided among the other four children.

By s. 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872: "If any licensed person permits drunkenness or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises or sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person, he shall be liable to a penalty. . . ."

The effect of the section held to be that the sale of intoxicating liquor to a drunken person was absolutely prohibited, and it was no answer to a prosecution under the section to show that the licensee or his servants did not know or had not the means of knowing that the person to whom the liquor was sold was drunk.

Notes. The Licensing Act, 1872, s. 13, has been repealed. See now s. 136 of the Licensing Act, 1953, which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor to drunken persons in the same terms.

A Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate sitting at West Ham.

On February 1, 1884, the defendant, a licensee, was charged under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 13, with selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person. It was proved that there had been a sale of intoxicating liquor, and that the person served was drunk, but it was also proved that neither the licensee nor his servants had noticed that the person served was drunk, and that the drunken person, while in the licensed premises, had been quiet in his demeanour and had done nothing to indicate insobriety, the evidence showing that there was no apparent indication of intoxication. Upon the evidence, it was contended for the licensee that there was nothing to show any knowledge or means of knowledge on the part of the licensee or his servants that the person served was drunk. The magistrate convicted the licensee, holding that the offence was complete on proof that a sale had taken place and that the person served was drunk, and that it was unnecessary to determine whether the licensee or his servants knew, or had the means of knowing, that the person served was drunk, or could, with ordinary care, have detected the drunkenness. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the construction placed by the magistrate on the section was right, or whether in arriving at his decision it was necessary for him to consider whether or not the licensee or his servants knew or had the means of knowing, or whether they could with ordinary care have detected, that the person served was drunk.

Besley for the licensee.

R. S. Wright (Danckwerts with him) for the prosecutor.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. The case turns upon the question whether the words of s. 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872—the section under which the conviction took place—taken in connection with the general scheme of the Act, should be read as implying that a licensed person, before he can be convicted under that section of selling intoxicating liquors, must know, or have reasonable means of knowing, that the person served was drunk, or whether the section amounts to an absolute prohibition against selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person, even when the seller had no such knowledge. I am of opinion that the words of the statute amount to an absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor to a drunken person, and that, if the person selling the liquor did not know, or had not the means of knowing, that the person served was drunk, this is no answer to the charge, but is merely a matter to be urged in mitigation of the penalties imposed by the section. I come to this conclusion, not only in consequence of the general object of the Act, which is an Act for the prevention of drunkenness, but also by a comparison of the sections dealing with “offences against public order.”

In some of these sections the word “knowingly” is introduced; for instance, by s. 14, a penalty is imposed upon a licensed person who “knowingly” permits his premises to be the habitual resort of prostitutes, and by s. 16 a penalty is imposed for “knowingly” harbouring a constable. In those cases knowledge is necessary to constitute the offence. But in the section we are now dealing with, the word “knowingly” does not occur, and I believe the object of omitting the word was to throw on the publican the duty of finding out whether the person served was drunk or not, the consequence being that, if a customer is drunk, the publican or his servants must find out that he is drunk, or take the consequences of serving him.

On the other side it has been urged that the maxim of the criminal law, that before a person can be convicted of a crime there must be a “guilty mind,” applies to this case. This maxim came into use in early times, when the criminal law was in an undefined state, for the guidance of those who administered that law, and in those times the maxim may have been of general application. A “guilty mind” is a necessary element in some crimes, but those crimes have now been defined, and the maxim has been superseded in consequence of the greater precision in the definitions of crimes, and now, the question whether a “guilty mind” is necessary to constitute an offence turns upon the words of each particular statute. R. v. Prince (1) shows that a guilty knowledge is not always necessary to constitute an offence; and R. v. Bishop (2) is to the same effect. The object of this part of the Act is to preclude all disputes whether the publican or his servants knew, or had reasonable means of knowing, that the person served was drunk at the time, the duty being thrown on the publican to find out that the person so served was not drunk. I think, therefore, that this conviction was right.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The language of this section is perfectly clear. This section would be altogether useless if the construction of counsel for the licensee were to prevail. It can be no hardship on the publican to have to find out whether the customer is drunk or not. It seems to me that the word “knowingly” was purposely omitted here. I quite agree with my brother STEPHEN that this conviction should be affirmed.

CORY & SONS v. BURR

[House of Lords (The Earl of Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn, Lord Bramwell and Lord FitzGerald), April 27, 30, 1888]

[Reported 8 App. Cas. 393; 52 L.J.Q.B. 657; 49 L.T. 78;
31 W.R. 894; 5 Asp.M.L.C. 109]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Excepted risks—Warranty free from capture and seizure—“Seizure”—No belligerent seizure—Seizure because of barratry of master—Smuggling.

In a time policy of marine insurance the ordinary perils, including “barratry of the master,” were insured against, and the subject-matter of the insurance was “warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat.” During the continuance of the policy the ship was seized and detained by the Spanish authorities in consequence of the barratrous act of the master in smuggling.

Held: (i) there was a seizure of the ship, since a “seizure” in such a warranty was not limited to a belligerent seizure; (ii) a warranty free from capture and seizure excepted losses arising out of and occasioned by capture and seizure, even if remotely occasioned by barratry; and (iii) accordingly, whether the loss was regarded as being occasioned by the act of barratry (per LORD BLACKBURN) or not (per LORD BRAMWELL and LORD FITZGERALD), the insurers were not liable.

Per LORD FITZGERALD: “Capture” would seem properly to include every act of seizing or taking by an enemy or belligerent. “Seizure” seems to be a larger term than “capture,” and goes beyond it, and may reasonably be interpreted to embrace every act of taking forcible possession, either by a lawful authority or by overpowering force.

Per LORD BLACKBURN: I do not think that in the case of barratry there is an exception to the general rule that in insurance you look to the proximate and not the remote cause; and per LORD BRAMWELL: I doubt whether such an exception exists.

Appeal by the plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Rosslyn, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.), reported 9 Q.B.D. 463, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (FIELD and CAVE, JJ.), reported 8 Q.B.D. 313, upon a Special Case that the defendant, the respondent to this appeal, was not liable under a time policy of insurance, of which he was one of the underwriters.

The policy enumerated the ordinary perils, including "barratry of the master," and the policy was "warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat." The captain had used the ship for smuggling. He had employed it for the purpose of carrying tobacco, and when he was off the coast of Spain, he caused the engines to be stopped to look out for the ship into which he had intended to tranship the tobacco in order that it might be smuggled. He proceeded dead slow while he was looking out for that vessel, and while he was doing this two craft came alongside with Spanish revenue officers on board, who seized the ship and took her to Cadiz. The ship was taken into possession in order to obtain a sentence of confiscation, and it would have been confiscated if the owners had not paid money to redeem it. The appellants' claim under the policy was dismissed by the Queen's Bench Division, and their appeal to the Court of Appeal from this decision was dismissed as stated above.

Webster, Q.C., and Tyser (Myburgh, Q.C., with them) for the appellants.
Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes for the respondent.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C.—This is an appeal from a unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming a unanimous judgment of the Queen's Bench Division; and I believe that all your Lordships agree that it is not necessary to call upon the counsel for the respondent. I am by no means sure that it might not be sufficient for me to say simply that I agree with the judgments given by FIELD and CAVE, JJ., and also in the reasons which they gave for those judgments, and in the reasons which were given in the Court of Appeal. I will, however, make one or two observations upon the principal points on which the case depends.

Everything depends upon the construction of the words of the warranty in the policy, the warranty being

"free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempts thereat."

The first question which has been considered in the argument has been, what is the meaning of the words "capture or seizure?" "Warranted free," clearly means that the insurers are not to be liable for the things to which the warranty applies. I own that I should have hesitated, even if there had been no authority, before I should have been brought to agree with the view which was thrown out in the course of the argument, and which BRETT, L.J., seemed to think might have influenced him if there had not been authority against it—I mean the view that "capture and seizure" in such a warranty must be taken to mean prima facie belligerent capture and seizure only. My reasons for saying so are that the word "seizure" is used as well as the word "capture." I am disposed to agree that if the word "capture" had stood alone it might have appeared to point to a belligerent capture, but the addition of the word "seizure" is only officious, as I read the warranty, by supposing that it is to exclude that narrow construction of the word "capture," and to let in other "seizures," such as CORTON, L.J., suggests, by means of the revenue laws of a foreign state.

The facts of this case show what the nature and effect of such a seizure is. The ship was seized in every sense we can put upon the word "seized." It was taken forcible possession of, and that not for a temporary purpose, not as incident to a civil remedy and the enforcement of a civil right, not as security for the performance of some duty or obligation by the owners of the ship, but it was carried into effect in order to obtain a sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship; and the case states that that would have been the result of the seizure which took place in the present instance if money had not been paid to redeem the ship from that confiscation and total loss. To my mind those facts are properly described by the word "seizure" in its natural sense, and unless there is something else in the policy to show that the word was meant to bear a different sense, not inclusive of such a state of facts, I should have said, in the absence of authority, that they were included.

But then we find that there are two authorities, which show, at all events, that these words in such a warranty cannot be restrained to a belligerent capture. In Kleinwort v. Shepard (1) there was a capture by a mutinous crew—an act which might be described as piracy on the part of that crew undoubtedly, and might therefore have come within the word "pirates," as mentioned in the policy, but it was not a belligerent capture beyond all doubt. In the other case, Powell v. Hyde (2), there was no belligerent capture, there was an accident. The ship was shot at and sunk by a friendly power mistaking her for an enemy. That would certainly not

A be a belligerent capture, but it was regarded as a "capture" in the sense which was to be obtained from the juxtaposition of the words "capture" and "seizure," and the comparison of them with the other words which occur in the body of the policy, and show that it was meant to cover and include all sorts of losses of that kind—losses by "men-of-war," by "enemies," by "pirates," by "rovers," by "takings at sea," by "arrests, restraints, and detainerments of all kings, princes, and people."

B Therefore, both on authority and on principle, I reject the idea that these words "capture and seizure" can be so narrowly construed as to exclude such a seizure as that which took place in the present case.

But then it is contended that if the claim might have been made upon the footing of barratry, though there was a capture or seizure, and though the capture or seizure only caused the loss, and there would have been no loss without the capture or seizure, yet that if a claim might be made upon the footing of barratry, then the warranty does not apply. I confess I have never seen how such a construction could be put upon the policy and the warranty, taken together, without leading to consequences altogether destructive of the whole operation of the warranty. Because—let me suppose the case of a belligerent capture—that capture is as much attributable to "men-of-war" or "enemies," or "taking at sea," as any seizure by

D reason of barratry can be attributed to barratry; indeed, more directly and immediately. Men-of-war and enemies might or might not have taken the ship, but their coming into contact with the ship, their firing at her—we may suppose their placing her in a position of jeopardy—is the first step towards "capture or seizure," which is its consequence. The argument, if it is sound as to barratry, would seem to be sound as to men-of-war and enemies also, that because there is an express insurance against those things, therefore, a "capture or seizure," and consequently an attack by men-of-war or enemies, is to be taken out of the warranty. I might follow it further as to "pirates," and as to "restraints and detainerments of kings, princes, and people." It is quite manifest that the object of this warranty is, and must be, to except such losses, otherwise covered by the policy, and coming within its express terms, as arise out of, and are as losses occasioned by, "capture or seizure."

F That appears to me to be equally the case whether remotely it was occasioned by barratry or not; in fact, the remoter it is the stronger the argument that it must be the case as to barratry. Therefore, I entirely agree both in the conclusions and in the reasons of the two courts below.

G LORD BLACKBURN.—I also agree entirely in the result to which the courts below have come, and with one exception, which perhaps is not very material, I agree with their reasoning; but I think it is necessary to say that I do not at present agree in one thing said. A passage was cited from ARNOULD ON INSURANCE (1st Edn.), vol. ii, p. 838, which lays down that, while it is very true that the general rule is that in insurance you look to the proximate cause and not the remote cause, there is an exception in the case of barratry, and that the remote cause may be looked to there. I can only say that I think there is no other authority for such a rule, and, though certainly FIELD, J., and BRETT, L.J., seemed to suppose naturally, on the authority of that statement in the textbook, that this was a rule of insurance law, I, as at present advised, do not think that it is. The very instances which are given in the passage from ARNOULD are instances in which the courts thought rightly or wrongly—I think rightly—that the cause of loss was barratry, and that the consequence for which the parties were entitled to be indemnified was not a remote consequence. That is all I say upon that part of the subject. I am merely putting in a protest against what may be hereafter cited as being an established principle of insurance law. For my own part I do not think that it is.

I Proceeding from that to the rest of the case, I thoroughly agree in the judgments which were pronounced below. The policy here is in the ordinary Lombard Street form, which has been in use for more than a century, and contains the ordinary enumeration of the perils against the loss from which the underwriters undertake to indemnify the assured. Many of these, as for instance, "men-of-war," "enemies," "pirates," "rovers," and, I may add, "barratry of the master or mariners," do not in themselves necessarily occasion any loss; but when by one of these the subject assured is taken out of the control of the owners, there is a total loss by that peril, subject to be reduced if by subsequent events the assured either do get, or but for their own fault might get, their property back: Dean v. Hornby (3). There are other perils, such as "takings at sea," "arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes," which from their nature involve such a taking of the subject insured out of the control of the owners.

That being the case, supposing there had been no warranty at all, was there a loss here which would be one for which the underwriters would be liable? Upon the facts stated, I cannot doubt it. The definitions of barratry in Earle v. Rowcroft (4) has never been departed from. The effect of that case is that the act of a captain, for his own purposes and to serve his own ends, engaging in a smuggling transaction which might tend, and in this case did tend, to the injury of his owners, and to the ship being seized, is barratry. The captain in the present case had done that: he had employed the ship for the purpose of carrying tobacco. When he was off the coast of Spain he caused the engines to be stopped to look out for the ship into which he had intended to tranship the tobacco in order that it might be smuggled, and he proceeded "dead slow" while he was looking out for that vessel. That was a clear case of barratry. While he was doing this "two craft came alongside with Spanish revenue officers on board, who seized the ship, and took her into Cadiz."

First of all, was that act of the two Spanish revenue officers in taking and seizing this ship, in itself one of those matters which would be covered by the insurance against the enumerated perils? I cannot myself doubt that it was. I cannot doubt that it came quite within the terms, "restraint and detention by a prince or people," namely the government of Spain, and their seizing the vessel was, I think, a thing for which the owners might have recovered under that head. But, it was also, I think, not at all a remote, but a direct and immediate consequence of the barratrous act of the captain, and it might, therefore, have been recovered for in the old times, when we were particular about pleadings under a count in which it was laid as being barratry, and the loss as being a consequence of it. The case that was referred to of Havelock v. Hancill (5) is a case where the party recovered on a count for barratry, which would not in itself occasion any damage—but it was held good on demurrer—and in those days they were particular upon demurrer—the count alleging almost identically the same thing as happened here, except that the seizure was by the English government for smuggling against the English law, instead of being by the Spanish government for smuggling against the Spanish law. That was a case in which the underwriters were held to be responsible, and I think myself that they might also have been held responsible if the count had alleged the loss to have been occasioned by restraint of princes.

Now comes the question, Does this warranty free the underwriters from that responsibility? That is the main question. First, let us see what the warranty is. There are warranties which in effect merely say, We will define the sort of adventure in which you shall be engaged when we are to indemnify you; for example, it shall be warranted that the ship shall not sail anywhere except in the Mediterranean, or something of that sort, defining the risk which they are to encounter; and if the ship goes out beyond that distance, then it is like a deviation. she has incurred a different kind of risk from that which the underwriters undertook to bear—it has become altogether a different adventure. That is one description of warranty. But there is another which has been for a long time used, expressed in the phrase "warranted free from" particular things. I need only point, as I did in the course of the argument, to the ordinary warranty which is printed at the foot, and has been so for more than a century, known as the memorandum,

A "corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins are warranted free from average under £5 per cent. and all other goods; also the ship and freight are warranted free from average under £3 per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt."

B That kind of warranty, "warranted free" in that sense, means that, although the general terms of the policy would have covered this, yet, considering the special riskiness of the particular matter, the underwriters, unless they are paid a premium for consenting to take it in, do not choose to be liable where the particular thing happens which they have stipulated by this warranty that they shall be warranted free from.

C Here they are "warranted free from capture or seizure, and the consequences of any attempts thereat." It was argued that here they have not been warranted free from barratry. That is true; but the barratry would itself occasion no loss at all to the parties insured if it had not been that the Spanish revenue officers, doing their duty—they were quite right in that respect—had come and seized the ship. The barratry of the captain in coasting along there—hovering, as we should call it, along the coast—in order that the small smuggling vessel might come and take the tobacco, would have done the insured no harm at all. The underwriters do undertake to indemnify against barratry; they do undertake to indemnify against any loss which is directly sustained in consequence of the barratry; and in this case, I think, as I said before, the seizure was as direct a consequence of the barratry as could well be. But still, as FIELD, J., says, it was the seizure which brought the barratry into operation. I think that is the phrase which he uses. E The seizure brought the loss into existence—it was a case of seizure. Then why should it not be protected by this warranty?

The American cases which have been referred to are quite different; they are founded upon Havelock v. Hancill (5). There the voyage was described as "any lawful adventure," or "any lawful voyage," and if it had been not a lawful voyage it would have been like a deviation. It would have been a different kind of adventure from that of which the underwriters took the risk. The fact of its being not a lawful voyage would have made it one for which they had not engaged to be responsible. The underwriter in that case might have said: "Non hæc in fœdera veni. I have engaged to indemnify you against the risks of a lawful voyage, you engaged in an unlawful voyage." But the answer was: "This was not an unlawful voyage, for what was done here was to engage in a lawful voyage, and the barratry of the captain did not make that voyage unlawful." G The decision has stood now for a century, and has not been quarrelled with. I should have thought that that was as plain a decision as one could wish for. The American courts upon that—with some want of logic, I cannot help thinking—drew the inference that, where there was a warranty free from seizure and capture in consequence of illicit trading, they were to hold that it was to be an illicit trading to which the insured was a party. H I think that is what it comes to, or at least to which the owner of the ship was a party. I think that is an illogical consequence, and I do not approve of the reasoning by which it was come to. But it is sufficient to say that it has nothing to do with the present case. There was no illicit trading here, there was nothing but the act of barratry. There are no such words used here as "warranted free from capture or seizure in consequence of illicit trading," if that would have made any difference. I

The question then is reduced, as it seems to me, to this: When the whole loss was occasioned by that which was certainly a "seizure," is it within the meaning of the warranty? I say certainly it is. If it were perfectly res integra there would be something to be said in favour of holding that "capture" and "seizure" ought to be limited, or might be supposed to be limited, to belligerent risks—risks in times of war—although I think that there would be a great deal to be said against it. But the point is not new. In Kleinwort v. Shepard (1) the seizure was one which was in no wise connected with the acts of foreign princes or their subjects, it being the act of coolies, who were not pirates in the sense of being assailing thieves, for they were lawfully in the ship; they were passengers who rose in mutiny; they were not barratrous, for they were not the captain nor the crew, they were neither the one nor the other; but it had been held in Palmer v. Naylor (6), which I argued myself, that whether they were pirates or not, it was quite clear that they were ejusdem generis, and consequently they came within the words "and other perils." It was at least another peril which was clearly covered. In Kleinwort v. Shepard (1) it was decided that a seizure of that sort was a seizure within the perils which were warranted against. That is in fact a much stronger decision than the present. All that it is necessary to say in the present case is that the warranty is against a seizure by a power. I do not say at all that Kleinwort v. Shepard (1) is not perfectly right. I only say that it goes further than is required here, and I also say that when a decision has been come to and acted upon, which has stood for thirty years, as to the construction of such words as these, it requires some very strong reasoning to justify one in saying that we should now hold that where people have used these identical words, knowing the meaning which has been previously put upon them by a judicial decision, they do not mean the same thing. Consequently, I think that strong reasoning will be required for reversing Kleinwort v. Shepard (1).

But it is enough to say that this was a seizure, being the act of the power which made that seizure, and, therefore, that the court below are perfectly right in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of the same opinion. What was in contemplation by the parties in this case may be very doubtful; and I should have thought that it was very doubtful also what was the meaning of these words originally; but a meaning has been put upon them, and, that meaning having been acted upon, I think it is desirable that it should be abided by, because undoubtedly people who make contracts make them in reference to the well-understood meaning of such words, and if that meaning is an inconvenient one they can alter the words. I think that the meaning of the words which are here to be construed is now plain. The warranty is a warranty "free from capture and seizure"; it is perfectly general in its terms. If the vessel has been captured or seized, and a loss has been thereby occasioned, it is within the warranty.

It is said here that the loss was not from the seizure, but that in truth it was from the barratry, and it is ingeniously suggested that the seizure was "an intermediate step." But it was the ultimate and final step which occasioned the loss, and but for the payment of money the ship would have been confiscated, which would have been merely a following up of the seizure. One might put this case: Supposing the ship had been confiscated and sold, and then the Spanish government, upon some representations made to them, had returned a portion of the proceeds, would there not have been a loss by seizure? There would. And is it not equally so now? To my mind that point is really not tenable. But then it is said that when barratry is the causa remota of the loss it nevertheless may be relied upon without reference to the causa proxima. I will say nothing as to any general rule, except to express a doubt as to whether what BRETT, L.J., said about that matter is perfectly correct. I have a misgiving about it, but I do not consider it necessary to determine anything of that sort here. It is possible that in some cases where there has been barratry, and a consequent loss within the perils insured against, you might call that a loss by barratry. In my opinion you cannot do so in this case. Call it an ultimate loss if you like. That ultimate loss was by a seizure, and that was warranted against.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I entirely agree. The question arises on the proper interpretation of the limitation of the liability of the insurers contained in the clause, "warranted free from capture and seizure, and of any attempt thereat."

A This warranty must be taken to apply to some of the risks previously enumerated, and to limit the otherwise unlimited liability of the insurers. On looking back to the enumeration of the perils which the policy was intended to cover, we find some the generality of which may be the subjects of the limitations expressed in the warranty. For example,

B "arrests, restraints, and detainerments of all kings, princes, and peoples of what nation, condition, or quality soever; barratry of the master and mariners, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes."

C The contention of the appellants is that the warranty does not apply where, as in the case before us, the seizure has been the immediate consequence of the barratrous act of the master, and, on the other hand, the respondent insists on the literal construction of the warranty as embracing all cases in which the ship has been taken forcible possession of by superior power or authority. If the latter construction is to prevail, then the respondent contends that, the seizure having been the immediate proximate cause of the loss, he, the insurer, is exempt from liability. The question seems a simple one; but, if we depart from the literal construction, we may be led into complications and metaphysical refinements from which mercantile contracts ought, as far as possible, to be free. If the question had come before us unfettered by authority, and if the decision in the court below had been in favour of the appellants, I should have been content. But I have an invincible objection to uncertainty in the interpretation of mercantile contracts. The literal interpretation of the exemption would embrace all cases of capture or seizure which would otherwise have been within the perils insured against, and so far as the authorities have gone they are in favour of the respondent's contention. E I allude to Powell v. Hyde (2) and Kleinwort v. Shepard (1), which have been already commented upon. In the construction of this warranty it is observable that capture and seizure do not mean the same thing. "Capture" would seem properly to include every act of seizing or taking by an enemy or belligerent. "Seizure" seems to be a larger term than "capture," and goes beyond it, and may reasonably be interpreted to embrace every act of taking forcible possession, either F by a lawful authority, or by overpowering force.

I am quite satisfied with, and adopt, the interpretation put upon these words in the judgments of the courts below, following the views put forward in Powell v. Hyde (2) and Kleinwort v. Shepard (1). It was urged upon us that it was unreasonable and unjust as applied to the present case. It appears to me, on the contrary, G that the warranty, as now interpreted, was a reasonable stipulation for the insurers to make. I find the following to be the definition of "barratry" given by WILLES, J., in Lockyer v. Offley (7) (1 Term Rep. at p. 259):

"Barratry is every species of fraud or knavery of the master by which the freighters or owners are injured."

H It is obvious with so loose a definition as that, there may be instances of barratry which may be either harmless, or effect but a small loss; for instance a deviation, or wilful delay. But barratry may also consist in a very small matter, over which the owners or freighters have no control, the effects or consequences of which may be very serious, and I can well understand the prudence of insurers stipulating. "We will not be responsible for seizure caused by some barratrous act of the master or crew, rendering not only the ship, but also the cargo, liable to confiscation."

I If such be the interpretation which is to be put upon the contract, I ask the question, By what was the loss occasioned? I apprehend that there can be but one answer to this question, namely, that the loss arose from the seizure. There was no loss occasioned by the act of barratry. The barratry created a liability to forfeiture or confiscation, but might in itself be quite harmless. But the seizure which was the effective act toward confiscation, and the direct and immediate cause of the loss, was not because the act of the master was an act of barratry, but that it was a violation of the revenue laws of Spain. In the same clause of the warranty the words are "warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat." A

If in place of the Spanish cruiser having seized their vessel she had failed to seize her, but in the attempt had sunk the vessel, I should have put the same question, "What caused the loss?" and the proper answer would have been: "Not the barratrous act of the captain, but the sinking of the vessel by the Spanish cruiser." B
On these grounds I agree that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir George Jessel, M.R., Brett and Lindley, L.J.J.), January 11, 1882] E

Company—Registration—Mutual marine insurance association with more than twenty members—Indemnification of individual members an object for "the acquisition of gain"—Need for registration. F

Company—Winding-up—Unregistered company—Company required to be registered under the Companies Act, 1862—Company unlawful—Effect on winding-up order—Discharge by way of appeal—Leave to appeal out of time.

A mutual marine insurance association, formed in 1867, consisting of more than twenty members, and not registered, was managed by a committee of members, under certain rules and regulations. In 1880 a winding-up order was made on the petition of the assignee of a claim of a member whose ship had been lost. The petition was served at the abandoned office of the association, which had ceased to carry on business. The point of the constitution of the association had not been brought to the notice of the judge whose order to wind-up was in fact, though not in form, made ex parte, no one appearing to oppose it. In 1881 a member of the association, who had only just become aware of the presentation of the petition and the making of the winding-up order, gave notice of appeal from the order, asking that the time for appealing might be extended. G

Held: (i) the object of the association being the indemnification of the individual members in the event of loss was an object for "the acquisition of gain" within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, s. 4, and the association ought to have been registered under the Act; (ii) as the association was unregistered it was unlawful, and the court had no jurisdiction to make a winding-up order; (iii) the court making the order was competent to decide its own jurisdiction and in the circumstances the order was not a nullity but an erroneous order, and the proper mode of discharging the order was by way of appeal; (iv) as the order was made without the question of the constitution being disclosed to the court and as the appellant was ignorant of the making of the order leave to appeal out of time ought to be given. Appeal to discharge a winding-up order made by MALINS, V.-C.

The subject of the winding-up order was a mutual marine assurance association which was formed in 1867 and which carried on business at Padstow in Cornwall. The association consisted of more than twenty members and was not registered under the Companies Act, 1862.

The society was managed by a committee of the members, under certain rules and regulations. The rules, which were endorsed on the policies issued by the association, and made part of them, provided that it should consist of owners and part owners of vessels. Rules 3, 5 and 8 provided as follows:

"3. That on any vessel, or part thereof, being entered in this association, the owner, or owners, shall immediately pay the sum of £1 per cent. on the amount insured, as a deposit towards paying any loss that may happen, and 5s. per cent. towards a fund for incidental expenses; and that the said owner or owners, on subscribing his or their names to the legal documents of the association, shall become a member thereof, and be subject to its rules. The money deposited shall be placed at the disposal of the committee for the time being.

5. No vessel shall be insured in this association in any greater sum than £1,000, and which amount shall not in any case, exceed three-quarters of the value of such vessel.

8. The perils insured against are as follows: In case any vessel belonging to this association shall be taken, lost, wrecked, destroyed by fire, or stranded, and thereby receive so much damage as shall induce the owner or owners to abandon her to this association, and which abandonment such owner or owners may make when the actual damage done to the vessel stranded shall be satisfactorily shown to the committee to exceed 75 per cent. of her entered value, subject to the proviso hereinafter contained, then the members, their heirs, executors, or administrators, severally, and not jointly, each one for himself, and not for each other, shall, as often as the case shall happen, and after satisfactory proof be given, pay the loser or losers of such vessel the amount insured in this association, rateably and proportionately by each member according to his amount assured. . . . In case any vessel insured in this association should run down any other vessel, and the owners be called on to make good the value of the vessel so run down, this association shall either defend any action that may be brought against the owners of the vessel which may have run down such other vessel, and pay its proportion of costs and damages in such cases (such damages and costs not to exceed the amount the said vessel is insured in this club), or pay to such owner two-thirds of the sum in which the vessel may be insured in this association, in either case subject to the usage at Lloyd's."

Rule 9 provided that if the contribution of a member should not be recovered through his insolvency, the loss should be borne by the members generally. The policies issued by the association were signed by the manager per procuration of the several members.

On Sept. 21, 1875, Richard Redway, one of the members, effected a policy of insurance for £400 for a year on a ship called the Memento, of which he was the owner. The ship was lost in February, 1876. Disputes arose between him and the committee as to his right to recover the amount of the insurance, and the question was in August, 1877, referred to arbitration. In January, 1878, Redway assigned for value the policy, and all moneys payable to him under it to the Devon and Cornwall Banking Co. In February, 1878, the arbitrators made an award that £253 was due to Redway on the policy. The agreement to refer to arbitration was in April, 1878, made an order of the Queen's Bench Division; and in March, 1879, the banking company brought an action in the name of Redway in the Queen's Bench Division against the association for payment of the sum found due by the arbitrators, and in April, 1879, they obtained judgment by default for £253, with costs. In November, 1879, the banking company issued execution on the judgment, but failed to obtain any payment thereby.

In 1880 the banking company presented a petition for the winding-up of the association, which had then ceased to carry on business, and had closed its office. The petition was served at the abandoned office of the association, and was

A advertised in the "London Gazette" and in two local papers. The association did not appear on the hearing of the petition, and on May 28, 1880, MALINS, V.-C., made a winding-up order. The petition stated that the association consisted of more than seven members, but did not state that it consisted of more than twenty members, and so far as appeared the petitioners did not know this. On Nov. 18, 1881, Mr. Charles Bryant, the appellant, who had been a member of the association, and who had only just become aware of the winding-up order, gave notice of appeal from the order and of an application for the extension of the time for appealing. The application for the extension of time for appealing was ordered to stand over to the hearing of the appeal.

By the Companies Act, 1862, s. 4:

C "No company, association, or partnership, consisting of more than ten persons, shall be formed, after the commencement of this Act, for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking, unless it is registered as a company under this Act, or so formed in pursuance of some other Act of Parliament, or Letters Patent; and no company, association, or partnership, consisting of more than twenty persons, shall be formed after the commencement of this Act, for the purpose of carrying on any other business that has for its object the acquisition of gain by the company, association, or partnership, or by the individual members thereof, unless it is registered as a company under this Act, or is framed in pursuance of some other Act of Parliament, or of letters patent, or is a company engaged in working mines within and subject to the jurisdiction of the Stannaries."

E By s. 199:

"Subject as hereinafter mentioned, any partnership, association, or company, except railway companies, incorporated by Act of Parliament, consisting of more than seven members, and not registered under this Act, and hereinafter included under the term "unregistered company," may be wound up under this Act; and all the provisions of this Act with respect to winding-up shall apply to such company . . ."

G SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.—This appeal is on a point which was not brought to the notice of MALINS, V.-C., whose order was in fact, though not in form, made ex parte. The petition was served correctly according to law, but in fact the appellant had no notice of it. There was nothing in the petition to call the attention of the learned judge to the question of the lawfulness of the association.

H The first point to consider is whether, assuming that the association was an unlawful one, and that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order to wind it up, the proper mode of getting rid of that order was to appeal from it. I think it was. The order was made by a court which was competent to decide whether it had jurisdiction, and must be treated as a decision that it had jurisdiction. There was, therefore, an error in the order, and an appeal from it would lie. The next question is whether leave to appeal ought to be given. I think it ought, notwithstanding the expiration of the twenty-one days limited by Ord. 58 for so doing.

I It is plain that the order was made without the difficulty in the constitution of the association being disclosed to the court. I do not say that was done improperly, for probably the counsel who obtained the order did not know of the difficulty. Under these circumstances, and considering that the appellant was ignorant of the making of the order, leave to appeal ought to be given. The next question is, whether the association was clearly an unlawful one, and whether, if so, a winding-up order could be made. If the association was one which was unlawful under s. 4 of the Act, I think that both by the authority of the decided cases such as Re Arthur Average Association (1), and Re South Wales and Atlantic

Steamship Co. (2), and on principle no winding-up order could be made. Section 199 must apply to some partnership, association, or company which could be lawfully formed. If the formation of the association was prohibited by s. 4 it was impossible that the legislature should say that that which could not be formed under s. 4 should be wound-up under s. 199 with all the consequences which would follow from a winding-up order. A

The last and most difficult question is, whether this association was one the formation of which was prohibited by s. 4. Was it an association formed for the purpose of carrying on business? On this point I think there can be no doubt. The policy is in the form of an ordinary policy of marine assurance. It copies Lloyd's policy almost verbatim. It is signed for the several members by procuration. In form it is a policy of marine insurance by several insurers who are the members of the association. There is every feature of a marine insurance company. B

Was, then, the association one whose business had for its object "the acquisition of gain by the association or by the individual members thereof?" It is plain, though the object was not the acquisition of gain for the association as a whole, the object was the acquisition of gain by the individual members. Each member paid a small sum with the view of obtaining a larger sum on the happening of an uncertain event. Was the obtaining of the large sum a loss or a gain because there happened to be a loss? It appears to me that there could not be any such limitation of the meaning of the word "gain." I do not think that, because the loss of a vessel was the occasion of a claim, the payment of the claim was the less a gain to the person who received it. And, looking at the general scope of the Act, I think the object of the provision is that commercial associations shall be registered, and that this association comes within the purview of the section, and it ought to be construed so as to carry out its object without too minute a criticism of the particular words. Consequently the winding-up order ought not to have been made, and it must be set aside. But, as there has been a general miscarriage, no costs will be given. C D E

BRETT, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The order appealed from being one of a superior court, which has jurisdiction in certain cases to make a winding-up order, if there is any error in it, it is an error in the particular case, and not an assumption of an unwarranted jurisdiction. The order cannot, therefore, be treated as a nullity, but is the proper subject of an appeal. The ordinary rule, therefore, which governs the time within which an appeal must be brought, applies, but it is a case in which the court ought to exercise its power to enlarge the time. If s. 4 applied to this association the law could take no cognisance of it at all, and the absence of notice to the petition could make no difference. It may not be necessary to decide the latter point, because the petitioner, who claims through a member who clearly had notice of the constitution of the association, cannot stand in a better position than he did. If the association is one prohibited by s. 4, I would not call it illegal, but its existence could not be recognised in any way by the law; it cannot be said to have ever existed. It is not an association formed to carry on a business, the object of which is the acquisition of gain by the association itself. But the object is that, in consideration of the members insuring other members' ships, their own ships should be insured in case of loss. The object of each individual member is that he shall be indemnified in case of the loss of his ship. Is that object the acquisition of gain? He lost his ship, and got the insurance money from his brother associates. From the loss of the ship he got that which was a gain to himself, and this, in my opinion, fulfilled the meaning of s. 4 of the Act. No association, therefore, of which the law could take cognisance has existed, and no winding-up order could be made. I may add that in Smith v. Anderson (3) I expressed an inclination of opinion to the contrary, but, after full argument, I feel that that opinion cannot be sustained. F G H I

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also concur. The question is whether a diversion of loss from the individual members was a gain to them within the meaning of s. 4.

A I think the words are wide enough, and are intended to be wide enough to include such a case. Then what is the consequence of the association not being registered? The words of the section are imperative, and they mean that such an association, if unregistered, is illegal in this sense, that the law cannot recognise its existence except in a criminal court.

Cole v. Crust, [1883] W.N. 141.

I Application by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of certain freehold hereditaments comprised in a mortgage dated Oct. 21, 1882, and made between the defendant Augustus Nixon of the one part, and the plaintiffs, J. Tillett and C. E. Groves, of the other part, to secure £1,135 and interest. The security was a first mortgage, under which the plaintiffs obtained the legal estate. There was a subsequent mortgage by the defendant Nixon to one J. Gargery. The action was for an account and foreclosure in default of payment, and the second mortgagee was made a defendant.

The interest on the plaintiffs' mortgage was in arrear, but the defendant contested the appointment of a receiver because of pending negotiations for the payment off of the mortgage by means of money which he anticipated he should obtain at a lower rate of interest.

The provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which were referred to as applying to mortgages executed after Dec. 31, 1881, are the following: A "Section 19 (1). A mortgagee, where the mortgage is made by deed, shall by virtue of this Act have the following powers, to the like extent as if they had been in terms conferred by the mortgage deed, but not further (namely):

(iii). A power, when the mortgage money has become due, to appoint a receiver of the income of the mortgaged property, or of any part thereof. B

Section 24 (1). A mortgagee entitled to appoint a receiver under the power in that behalf conferred by this Act shall not appoint a receiver until he has become entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by this Act, but may then, by writing under his hand, appoint such person as he thinks fit to be receiver.

(2). The receiver shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor; and the mortgagor shall be solely responsible for the receiver's acts and defaults, unless the mortgage deed otherwise provides." C

By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (8):

"A mandamus or an injunction may be granted or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order of the court in all cases in which it shall appear to the court to be just or convenient that such order should be made; and any such order may be made either unconditionally or upon such terms as the court shall think just; and if an injunction is asked, either before, or at, or after the hearing of any cause or matter, to prevent any threatened or apprehended waste or trespass, such injunction may be granted, if the court shall think fit, whether the person against whom such injunction is sought is or is not in possession under any claim of title or otherwise, or (if out of possession) does or does not claim a right to do the act sought to be restrained under any colour of title; and whether the estates claimed by both or by either of the parties are legal or equitable." D

Thurstan Holland for the plaintiffs.

St. John Clerke for the mortgagor. E

Dobbs for the second mortgagee. F

PEARSON, J.—I have always thought it a very hard case, that a legal mortgagee had no right to come to the court and ask for a receiver of the mortgaged property. I think, however, under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the court is now authorised to appoint one where it could not previously have done so; and those who framed s. 25 (8) of that Act seem to have been of the same opinion as I have expressed as to the hardship of the case. I have no doubt the mortgagee might appoint a receiver under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, without coming to the court, but when an action for foreclosure is pending, and the parties are at arm's length, it is much more desirable that the receiver should be appointed by the court. If the mortgagee wishes to have the appointment of a receiver effected in chambers the mortgagor cannot object, and cannot refuse to accede to the request. In this case there is no objection to the name of the person proposed, and I, therefore, appoint him to be receiver. Any question as to the costs of the application can be taken before the taxing master. G

Criminal Law—Sentence—Statutory maximum sentence for one offence—Conviction of two separate offences—Offences committed with common purpose—Power to pronounce maximum sentence for each of the two offences—Perjury.

The appellant was charged with perjury on an indictment which contained two counts, the first alleging perjury committed on the trial of an action of ejectment in 1871, the second alleging perjury committed in some proceedings in Chancery in 1868. The assignments of perjury in the two counts were, therefore, not identical, but the object of the proceedings in 1868 and in 1871 was the same, namely, to establish the appellant's right to certain landed estates. The jury returned a verdict of guilty on both counts of the indictment, and the appellant was sentenced to seven years penal servitude upon each count, the second term to commence upon the expiration of the first term. The charges had been brought under the Perjury Act, 1728, s. 2, which provided: "it shall . . . be lawful for the . . . judge before whom any person shall be convicted of . . . perjury . . . to order such person to be sent to some house of correction . . . for a term not exceeding seven years. . ."

Held: (i) although the two offences were committed with a common purpose they were separate offences, and, therefore, the convictions of the appellant were valid; (ii) the sentences also were valid although their aggregate exceeded the maximum sentence which the court would have had power to pass for either offence alone.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (JAMES, BRAMWELL and BRETT, L.JJ.), reported 5 Q.B.D. 490, on a writ of error from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on an indictment for perjury, reported L.R. 9 Q.B. 350, when the plaintiff in error was sentenced to two consecutive terms of seven years' penal servitude each. E

The indictment contained two counts. The first count charged that the plaintiff in error had committed perjury by falsely swearing that he was Roger Tichborne in an action of ejectment (Tichborne v. Lushington) tried by BOVILL, C.J., and a special jury in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster. The second count charged that the plaintiff in error had committed perjury, also by swearing that he was Roger Tichborne, in an affidavit sworn before a commissioner appointed to administer oaths in Chancery in the City of London. The plaintiff in error was tried at Bar in the Court of Queen's Bench before COCKBURN, C.J., and MELLOR and LUSH, JJ., and a special jury. On Feb. 28, 1874, the jury found him guilty on both counts, whereupon sentence was passed by MELLOR, J., as follows:

"The sentence of the court is that for the perjury alleged in the first count of this indictment, upon which you have been convicted, you be kept in penal servitude for seven years; and that for the perjury alleged in the second count, of which you have also been convicted, you be kept in penal servitude for the further term of seven years, to commence immediately upon the expiration of the term of penal servitude assigned to you in respect of your conviction upon the first count of the indictment." F H

Judgment was entered on the record in the following terms:

"The jurors, on their oaths, say that the said Castro, &c., is guilty of the premises above charged in and by both the said counts. Whereupon all and singular the premises being seen and understood by the court, it is considered, adjudged, and ordered that he, the said Castro, alias Orton, &c., for the offence charged in and by the first count of the indictment be kept in penal servitude for the term of seven years now next ensuing; and that for and in respect of the offence charged in and by the second count of the indictment he be kept in penal servitude for the further term of seven years, to commence immediately upon the expiration of the said term of penal servitude for his offence in the first count charged; and he is now committed into the custody of the keeper of the gaol of Newgate, to be by him kept in safe custody in execution of this judgment." I

A The following grounds of error were assigned: (i) that the alleged perjuries constituted one offence only; (ii) That the second count did not disclose a separate perjury from that disclosed in the first count; (iii) That the offence in general being the same could not be treated as several offences in the same indictment; (iv) That without statutory provision several distinct offences could not be charged in the same indictment; (v) That two distinct and several indictable offences could
 B not be tried collectively; (vi) That without statutory provision there could not be two judgments on one indictment; (vii) That on one indictment the maximum penalty assigned by statute could not be cumulatively exceeded; (viii) That on one indictment without statutory provision a sentence of penal servitude or imprisonment could not be made to begin and to run from a future day; (ix) That penal servitude as a punishment for perjury was additional only.

C By s. 2 of the Perjury Act, 1728:

“The more effectually to deter persons from committing wilful and corrupt perjury or subornation of perjury, besides the punishment already to be inflicted by law for so great crimes, it shall and may be lawful for the court or judge before whom any person shall be convicted of wilful and corrupt perjury or subornation of perjury, according to the laws now in being, to order such
 D person to be sent to some house of correction within the same county for a time not exceeding seven years, there to be kept to hard labour during all the said time, or otherwise to be transported to some of His Majesty’s plantations beyond the seas, for a term not exceeding seven years, as the court shall think most proper, and thereupon judgment shall be given that the person convicted
 E shall be committed or transported accordingly, over and besides such punishment as shall be adjudged to be inflicted on such person, agreeable to the laws now in being.”

Benjamin, Q.C., Atherley Jones, Hedderwick, and Russell Spratt for the appellant.

F The Attorney-General (Sir Henry James, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C.), Poland and A. L. Smith, for the respondent, were not called on to address the House.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—Notwithstanding that the case has been argued at the Bar of the House with so much zeal in support of the appeal, I believe your Lordships are agreed that it is unnecessary to call upon the learned counsel
 G for the Crown to answer the objections which have been raised to the judgment pronounced by the Court of Queen’s Bench. No fewer than six objections have been taken to that judgment, and I will deal with them shortly, reserving to the last that which alone appeared to me to be seriously relied upon by the leading counsel for the appellant.

H The first objection to the judgment was that there was no finding of guilty upon each count, but that there was a general finding of guilty upon the charges which were contained in both counts. This objection was founded upon the language of the verdict, which was as follows:

“And now at this day—that is to say, on the said Saturday, the 28th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1874, the jurors aforesaid so empanelled and sworn as aforesaid, to try the issues so joined as aforesaid, upon their oath
 I say that the said Thomas Castro, otherwise called Arthur Orton, otherwise called Sir Roger Charles Doughty Tichborne, Bart., is guilty of the premises on him above charged in and by both counts of the indictment aforesaid above specified in the manner and form as aforesaid as by the indictment aforesaid is above supposed against him.”

I need not say more with regard to this objection than that it appears to be founded upon a perverse and an unreasonable construction of the language of the verdict, which clearly refers to each count.

His LORDSHIP dealt with two points raised respectively under s. 24 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851 [repealed by Indictments Act, 1915] and the Perjury Act, 1728 [repealed by Perjury Act, 1911], which do not now call for report. A

The next objection is that, the perjury in question having been committed in one and the same proceeding, it could not be made the subject of two separate punishments. No authority, however, was cited to show that perjury committed in the Court of Chancery in 1868 and perjury committed before the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in 1871 must be regarded as constituting one and the same offence, even although they had one common object—that of substantiating a claim to certain estates. I should have been of opinion that the offences were separate, even although the assignments of perjury in each count had been precisely the same, but in point of fact there are some which are different. There were two distinct offences committed at two distinct times in two distinct suits, and it is clear that the appellant was indictable in respect of each of them. B C

It has further been very zealously argued at your Lordships' Bar that, however many counts there might be, only one judgment could be properly passed upon one indictment for misdemeanour. No authority whatever has been cited in support of that contention, but O'Connell v. R. (1), which has been so often referred to for other purposes, is a full authority against it. I do not think it necessary to refer to any other authority than to read two or three passages which are to be found in the opinions delivered in that case. In the first place PARKE, B., says this (11 Cl. & Fin. at pp. 295, 296): D

"If this point were to be considered independently of the understood rule upon this subject, and supposing that no such rule existed, I should say that where an indictment contains several counts, each ought to be brought to its proper legal termination by a proper judgment. The practice has grown up, and much increased in modern times, of introducing many counts into one indictment; and though we know practically that these are most frequently descriptions only in different words of the same offence, they are allowable only on the presumption that they are different offences, and every count so imports on the face of the record, as BULLER, J., states in R. v. Young (2), though TAUNTON, J., intimated a different opinion, I think without sufficient ground, in R. v. Powell (3). The question then being how these counts are to be dealt with on the face of the record, I should have said, a priori, that it was the duty of the court acting between the Crown and the accused, and the right of the accused to have the charge of each offence, for as such I must treat it, properly and finally disposed of on the record, so that the accused as well as the Crown might know for what offence the punishment was inflicted, and for what not, . . ." E F G

I will now refer to what was said in this House by two noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment which the House pronounced, namely, LORD DENMAN, C.J., and LORD CAMPBELL, afterwards Lord Chief Justice. LORD DENMAN said (11 Cl. & Fin. at p. 377): H

"So with regard to several counts in criminal cases, the objection may be entirely avoided by the court passing a separate judgment upon each count, and saying, 'We adjudge that upon this count on which the prisoner is found guilty he ought to suffer so much; that on the second count he ought, on being found guilty, to receive such a punishment. Whether the count turns out to be good or not we shall now pronounce no opinion.'" I

LORD CAMPBELL adds (ibid. at p. 415):

"It is an utter mistake to suppose that there is only one corpus delicti which is made the subject of several counts in one indictment. Even with respect to felony, the law supposes a separate offence to be charged in each count; and in misdemeanours there are not unfrequently in the different counts entirely different offences, of different sorts, committed at different times."

A I may add that the judgment in that case was that, if there were not a separate judgment on each count, then, if there were one count bad at law, the judgment, being incapable of being referred to the good counts, must be regarded as distributed among them all, and the whole proceeding would fail. I must say that I heard this point argued by the junior counsel for the appellant with some surprise, because I understood that it had been given up by his learned leader.

B This brings me to the remaining objection, and the only one of substance—if such it could be called—in the case, which is, that a separate and cumulative sentence of seven years' penal servitude was imposed upon the appellant in respect of each count of the indictment, whereas by s. 2 of the Perjury Act, 1728 [repealed by Perjury Act, 1911] and the Acts of Parliament amending the same the maximum term of penal servitude that could be inflicted in respect of the offence charged in the indictment was seven years only, and no greater penalty could be imposed for any offence or offences charged in one and the same indictment greater than the maximum penalty imposed by the law for such offence or offences. If it were not possible consistently with the law to inflict cumulative punishments, one to take effect after the expiration of the other, this argument might have had some weight. It has, however, been settled in this House as long ago as 1769, in R. v. Wilkes (4), that the proper course when more than one sentence had to be pronounced was that the second term of punishment should commence at the expiration of the first.

To the reasons given for that by WILMOT, C.J., and apparently adopted by this House, I will shortly refer. I will first, however, state the question which was raised and put to the judges, which was this:

E “Whether a judgment of imprisonment against a defendant to commence from and after the determination of an imprisonment to which he was before sentenced for another offence is good in law?”

to which the learned judges returned an affirmative answer in the terms of the question; and thereupon this House affirmed the judgment which had been in fact so pronounced. That was a case of misdemeanours, and the material passages

F which I think it worth while to refer to in the opinion delivered by WILMOT, C.J., and reported in 19 State Tr. at p. 1133, are these:

“In treasons and felonies a certain known judgment which cannot be departed from, viz., in the present tense of the subjunctive passive; but in misdemeanours, where punishment is discretionary, the limitation as to time seems only to be that the punishment shall take place before a total dismissal of the party; a punishment shall not hang over a man's head when he has been once discharged; that is properly a punishment in futuro. But while he remains under a state of punishment, while he is suffering one part of his punishment, he is very properly the object of a different kind of punishment to take place during the continuance of the former, or immediately after the end of it.”

G

H A little further on he says that if the punishment had been inflicted by imprisonment for twelve months, then, as he was already sentenced to ten months, it would have been only an imprisonment for two; in other words, that the power which the court thought fit, having discretion, to exercise, of awarding a period of twelve months' imprisonment for the second offence, could not have been exercised unless it were by placing it after the expiration of the first.

I will observe that in a case like the present, where the statutory power is to imprison for a term not exceeding seven years, if you were to pass two simultaneous sentences commencing at the same time, it would be manifest that for the second offence there would be no punishment at all suffered, even though it were given for the maximum period. Later WILMOT, C.J., says this:

“We cannot explore any mode of sentencing a man to imprisonment who is imprisoned already but by tacking one imprisonment to the other, as is done in the present case.”

So far, therefore, as relates to misdemeanours, and subject, therefore, to the question whether this authority would apply when the aggregate of the two punishments exceeds in point of time the sentence which there would have been power to award for either offence alone, R. v. Wilkes (4) in this House is a clear and distinct authority in favour of the proposition that when a man is found guilty of two distinct misdemeanours, being distinct and separate offences, and not the same (I apprehend that it makes no kind of difference whether it be by two indictments simultaneously tried and found against him, or upon two counts in one, and the same indictment), there, not only a competent, but the proper course independent of any statutory legislation, was and is to pronounce the second sentence of imprisonment, within the power of the court as to duration, to begin after the expiration of the first.

If that be so, I ask what difference can it make that a statute has said that for a single offence, instead of having a discretionary power to imprison for any term that may be thought fit, the court shall have power to imprison for a term not exceeding seven years? The only difference it makes is that for each offence the court can go as far as seven years, and cannot go further; but the moment that it is ascertained that it is proper for the court to make a second sentence for a distinct offence commence after the expiration of the imprisonment to be suffered for the first, then the sentence so commencing, being for seven years only, is not within the sense of the statutory limit, and it is a mere fallacy, the moment that you understand the point of R. v. Wilkes (4), to mix up the two together as if they were one offence, and to say that because only one seven years can be inflicted for a single offence, therefore only seven years in the aggregate can be inflicted for two offences. The statute has not said so, and having regard to what the House decided in R. v. Wilkes (4), it would be perfectly nugatory, and would be absolutely depriving the court of the power of postponing the commencement of the sentence, to say that it ought to be so. Because, if the argument were good for anything, it would be good not only to cut off the seven years, but to cut off any part of the seven years. If the first sentence was for the full period of seven years, the result would be that it would be impossible, according to that argument, to sentence a man for a second offence for a period to commence after the end of the first.

It does not stop there, because since 1769 the legislature has thought fit to extend this principle even to cases of felony. By the Criminal Law Act, 1827 [repealed by Criminal Justice Act, 1948], it was provided by s. 10 of the Act that when a person was "already imprisoned under sentence for another crime, it shall be lawful for the court to award imprisonment for the subsequent offence, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment to which such person shall have been previously sentenced."

The section went on to provide, ex cautela, as I conceive, that the court might award a sentence for a subsequent offence

"although the aggregate term of imprisonment... may exceed the term for which either of those punishments could be otherwise awarded."

These words I apprehend that if those last words had not been there the effect would have been practically the same; but those words at all events show that as far as those cases are concerned the intention of the legislature when expressly dealing with them was the same as I conceive would have resulted in law from the rule which was settled in this House in R. v. Wilkes (4) as to cases of misdemeanour.

That was followed by R. v. Robinson (5), in which thirteen learned judges were of opinion that, there being two distinct misdemeanours charged in the same indictment in different counts, and one sentence for two years' imprisonment

A passed, that was bad, because by statute one year was the maximum term which the court had the power to inflict for the offence. All the thirteen judges are stated to have been unanimously of opinion that the sentence was incorrect, and that there should have been consecutive judgments of one year's imprisonment for each offence. The conviction was, therefore, held to be bad. That was a case of misdemeanour; it was not a case of felony; it is, therefore, as far as the opinion
B of the thirteen judges goes, expressly in point on the present occasion.

After that another Act of Parliament was passed, giving justices, in the exercise of summary jurisdiction in criminal cases, a similar power to that which had been given to the court by the Act of 1827. That Act was the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. It said that where justices upon information should adjudge a defendant to be imprisoned, and the defendant should "be then in prison undergoing
C imprisonment upon a conviction for any other offence, the warrant of commitment for the subsequent offence shall in every such case be forthwith delivered to the gaoler to whom the same shall be directed," and it should be lawful for the justices issuing it, if they thought fit, to award imprisonment for such subsequent offence which should commence at the expiration of the imprisonment to which such defendant should have been previously adjudged or sentenced. The legislature did
D not add in that statute the words, "although the aggregate term of imprisonment may exceed the term for which either of the punishments could be otherwise awarded." A question under that statute came before the Court of Queen's Bench in R. v. Cutbush (6) in 1867, and the only difficulty that was felt there by the learned judges, if any difficulty was seriously felt, was that the language of the one statute was: "Whenever sentence shall be passed for felony upon a person
E already imprisoned under sentence for another crime"; and the words of the later statute were: "such defendant shall be then in prison undergoing imprisonment"; and the later statute, being thus expressed, seemed to justify the argument that if he had not actually got into prison, although a sentence of imprisonment had been pronounced upon him, the sections did not apply. But that was held to be an untenable argument. Cockburn, C.J., stated, after communing with the other
F judges, that it was ascertained that the practice of the judges, as far as living judicial memory went, under the Act of 1827, had been to act upon that statute whenever more than one case of felony was established against a man, and he was convicted of those offences at one and the same time, and to make the sentence of imprisonment for the second or third offence, as the case might be, commence at the expiration of the sentence previously awarded. The learned Chief Justice,
G although admitting that there was some technical difficulty, not in any other part of the matter, but in the words I have read, which seemed to contemplate that the man should be actually in prison, yet thought the reason and substance of the case to be so clear, in addition to the authority to be derived from the exposition based upon the earlier statute by the uniform practice, as to make it right to hold that cumulative sentences might be awarded under those statutes even though the
H man had not already found his way to prison; and in point of fact one sentence was passed practically at the same time as the other.

The practice, therefore, as far as can be ascertained from any of the authorities, or from any of the books, has been uniform in favour of consecutive cumulative sentences of this kind. If it were not so, it would be difficult to see how it would be possible that any punishment at all could be inflicted for more than one offence,
I if the convictions took place at the same time. The decision in the State of New York in Tweed v. Lipscombe (7), appears to me to proceed upon New York law and not upon English law; and the cardinal proposition upon which it depends is one of those which, if the view I have submitted to your Lordships is correct, we must reject as erroneous, namely, that only a single judgment can be pronounced upon a single indictment. For all these reasons, and also bearing in mind that the courts before whom this question has already come have unanimously agreed in their determination that there is no error in this record, I must move your Lordships to affirm the judgment, and to dismiss the appeal.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I have never been able, from the beginning to the end, A to entertain the least doubt that the judgment in this case should be affirmed.
The first point which has been made on behalf of the plaintiff in error I think only requires to be stated to answer itself. It has been said that, when there was in the Court of Chancery a proceeding pending to set aside some outstanding term in order to permit a trial at law in an action of ejectment, and in the course of that the plaintiff, who is now the prisoner, being sworn, committed wilful and B corrupt perjury, for the purpose of misleading the Court of Chancery in that suit, that was not a different offence, or rather, that the two offences were substantially the same as the offence he committed afterwards, at the trial of the ejectment, in swearing falsely, and committing wilful perjury, with the intent to mislead the court that was trying the question of ejectment. It is said that they were substantially the same offence, because both perjuries were committed in suits in C which the ultimate object was to recover certain estates situate in Hampshire and Dorsetshire.

Taking that to be the point, and stating it in that way, it does seem to me, upon the face of it, to be difficult to state anything which would make it more obviously wrong than the mere statement of the case does. We have nothing whatever to do with the ultimate object of the suit. The crime of perjury was D complete as soon as the appellant wilfully and falsely swore a matter with the intention to mislead the Court of Chancery. The crime of perjury was complete when, at a subsequent time, he wilfully and intentionally made a false statement on oath with intent to mislead the Court of Common Pleas. No doubt his object in each case was to recover the same estates. In like manner, in the case which was put by way of illustration, the object of a man who breaks open a house in the E country with the intention to steal a jewel-case, and, finding that the lady has carried it to London, goes to London, and breaks into a house in London, and gets the jewel-case, his object in each case is to get the jewels, but no one will dispute that they are two crimes. It would have been quite possible, if the legislature had been so wilfully absurd, to have so worded the Perjury Act, 1728, as to say that, when a man has, with one object, committed perjury, and commits F afterwards any number of other perjuries for the same purpose, the aggregate punishment shall never, under any circumstances, exceed the seven years. Such a thing, if sufficiently expressed by the legislature, would, of course, be valid, but it is not pretended that there is a word in the statute which can by any torturing in argument afford a basis for that proposition.

HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the points under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, and G the Perjury Act, 1728, which, as stated supra, need not now be reported, and continued: Then we come to what is more nearly approaching to something of substance. I must say at once that I totally disagree with what has been repeatedly asserted by both the learned counsel at the Bar—that the pleadings at common law in a criminal case and a civil case were in the slightest degree different. I am speaking, of course, of the time before the Judicature Acts were H passed, which swept them all away. Many enactments had from time to time been passed relieving the strictness of pleadings in civil cases which did not relieve them in criminal cases, but the rules of pleading at common law were exactly the same in each case. The course taken with regard to an indictment which was found was this. The Queen having sent her commission to the grand jury, the indictment presented all the offences charged against the prisoner, and if it I was brought before the court sufficiently that a man had committed ten murders, fifty burglaries, and a score of larcenies, they would find, not one finding as to them all, but that he had committed each of those charged offences, and if there were many other persons, as generally there are, it would be also found that those other persons had committed the offences charged against them also. Upon that a process could be issued against a man so charged to bring him upon his trial before a petty jury to try whether he was guilty of those offences so charged, or not.

- A At common law there was no objection whatever in point of law to bringing a man who was charged with several offences, whether those charges were felonies or misdemeanours, before one petty jury, and making him answer for the whole at one time. The contrary was asserted by the learned counsel, but, although repeatedly challenged to do so, he did not cite any authority in support of his contention. There was no legal objection to doing this; it was frequently not
- B fair to do it, because it embarrassed the man on trial if he was accused of several things, and the mere fact of accusing him of several things was supposed to tend to increase the probability of his being found guilty, as it amounted to giving evidence of bad character against him. For these mixed motives it was well established that whenever it would be unfair to a man to bring him to trial for several things at once an application might be made to the discretion of the presiding judge to say, "Try me only for one offence, or try me only for two offences, if one was the real thing let me be tried for one and one only", and wherever it was right that that should be done the judge would permit it. It is further established by a long series of decisions that where the several charges were of the nature of felony, the joining of two felonies in one count was so necessarily, I may say, unfair to the prisoner, that the judge ought, upon an application being
- D made to him, to put the prosecution to their election, and send them to two trials. It never was decided, indeed the contrary was often maintained, that if that application for the election was not made, even in felony, the joining of several felonies, that is to say, the taking several felonies which had been found upon the finding of the indictment together, and trying those several felonies before one jury, was wrong in point of law; on the contrary, it was repeatedly held that it was right
- E enough, although, if the proper application had been made at the proper time in a case of felony, the party prosecuting would have been put to his election, or made to take one trial only, and not both at the same time.

- In cases of misdemeanour it was by no means a matter of course that it should be done. I rather think that in point of practice, if the judge upon an application had been satisfied that to try the prisoner for several misdemeanours together would
- F have worked injustice to him, he had a perfect right to say: "I will not work this injustice by trying them together; let us diminish them in number, and try a reasonable number and no more." I do not know whether that was ever done in a case of misdemeanour, but I think it is very possible. I feel very little doubt that it may have been. I think that in such a case as the American case which was cited [Tweed v. Lipscombe (7)], where a man in one indictment was called
- G upon to answer for two hundred offences, he might not unreasonably have said: "That is too much to put a man upon his trial for; select five or six, try me on those, and let the rest stand over." I do not see that that would be at all an unreasonable application. In the present case, if an application had been made to the Court of Queen's Bench to put the prosecution to their election, and if it had been said: "I cannot be fairly tried for one offence of perjury committed in
- H Middlesex, if at the same time I am to be tried for perjury committed in London, therefore, there must be two separate trials," the Court of Queen's Bench would doubtless have said: "We will listen to the arguments that may be urged in its favour." What they could possibly have been, I do not know; but no such application was made. The prisoner was tried upon two indictments, the two counts were taken both together, and the result was that he was found guilty upon both.
- I Then came the question: What was the sentence to be? It is clear that, if the court had been pleased to grant the application, these two counts might have been tried, the one in London before a London jury, and the other in Middlesex before a Middlesex jury, and, but for the Act relating to the Central Criminal Court, which gives that court jurisdiction over both places, they must have been so tried. If they had been so tried, and if each jury had found a verdict of guilty on the counts brought before it separately, R. v. Wilkes (4) would have been an authority absolutely in point as to the sentence. But it is argued that when both charges were tried together before one jury, the consequence must be that the prisoner was not to be punished in the same way as he would have been if he had been tried for each offence before a separate jury, and he is, therefore, entitled to get off with less punishment. Why, I am sure I cannot conceive; nor can I see that any authority has been cited for that—at any rate, in English law—nor does it proceed on any reason. A

In regard to the American case which was cited [Tweed v. Lipscombe (7)], it might be enough to say that I observe that it proceeds upon the express ground that the court was acting upon New York decisions, subsequent to the Declaration of Independence, and upon New York statutes, and not upon English rules or English law. I daresay that decision may be right according to those New York decisions and statutes. The decision was this. They say that, according to their view, of the New York decisions, where there is but one trial before one jury, it must be for one offence, and one only, and upon that they all rest. They logically enough say that, if that is granted where there are sentences passed for more than one offence, all but one must be extra vires; accordingly, they held that the power of passing a sentence was exhausted. I leave it to the American judges to say whether that was right or not according to American law. I do not pretend to express an opinion on that, but I am quite clear that it is not English law. B C

I think that the English decisions are all the other way. I will mention but one or two cases which prove it. The first is Young v. R. (2), where the law is laid down in the way I have stated, that it is not a matter of right and law that two indictments shall not be tried together, but only a matter of election. Then comes R. v. Jones (8), where LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., both laid down the law as I have stated it, and acted upon it. Then R. v. Kingston (9), where LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., again repeats the doctrine; and lastly, R. v. Robinson (5), where it was said that the doctrine of R. v. Wilkes (4) ought to have been applied to a case where there were two misdemeanours in separate counts tried together before one judge. Taking all these cases together, I myself can feel no doubt at all that by the English law, and going by that alone, there is not a pretence for this writ of error. D E

LORD WATSON.—After hearing the very ingenious arguments on the part of the appellant, I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships, that there has been no reason whatever shown for reversing the judgment now under the review of the House. The view which I take of the various objections which have been urged against the validity of the verdict and sentence has been so well expressed already that I do not feel justified in adding more than a few words to what has already fallen from your Lordships. F G

The question as to what constitutes a separate offence where there has been a repetition of acts of the same character may at times involve questions of extreme nicety. It is unnecessary to deal with any of the cases such as have been suggested in the course of the argument, as to whether statements differing in their character, made by a person under oath upon the same occasion, will constitute separate acts of perjury when falsely made. It is quite unnecessary to consider that in the present case. I have no hesitation in holding with your Lordship upon the Woolsack, who, I think, indicated that opinion, that where at two different times, at different places, in different suits, and under the sanction of two different oaths, the same man repeats the same false statement, he thereby commits two separate acts of perjury, two different crimes; and I do not think it possible to bind these up together as one transaction, as was suggested in the able argument of the leading counsel for the appellant. You cannot make them partes ejusdem negotii, when so separated in time and place otherwise, by the mere fact that the person who committed the perjury on each of these occasions was actuated in both by the same motive, and had the same improper object in view. I think the criticism upon the terms of the verdict is quite unfounded, and that it must be taken that these words import, as according to their natural signification they do, in my opinion, that the jury thereby found the accused guilty H I

A of each of the separate charges of perjury in this indictment preferred against him.

What appeared to be the most important consideration which counsel for the appellant had to urge on his behalf was, that where upon one indictment there are two separate charges ejusdem generis, and the prisoner is convicted of both, if there be a statutory limit to the punishment which may be inflicted for one of these offences, that is to be the measure of all the punishment that can be inflicted upon him for more than one offence. So far as I could follow the argument, the learned counsel failed to assign any good reason for that contention. I think he did not dispute that separate cumulative punishments may be awarded, the second to take effect from the date of the expiring of the first sentence. But then it was said, although that is competent, there is an important rule of qualification which you must observe, and that rule is this: if for each offence the statute says that you shall inflict a sentence of not more than seven years' penal servitude, you cannot for the two offences exceed that limit.

For that proposition, which seems at first sight a very startling one, and does not, in my view, lose that character upon a closer inspection, no authority whatever was cited. At length at the close of his argument an appeal was made by the learned counsel to an American case, not as an authority, because I take it that the judgment of a court in New York is not an authority in a case of this kind arising in England with regard to English rules of procedure in criminal cases, but as showing an argument that ought to convince the House that it ought to come to the same conclusion in the present case as the court in America arrived at in Tweed v. Lipscombe (7). That case, even if it were receivable, does not appear to me to be in the least degree an authority for the proposition in support of which it was quoted. What was decided there, as I understand the case, was that the law of America differs from the law of England; and one of the judges expressly puts it that because of that difference the English authorities were of no authority in America. I should have thought that the converse of that proposition would be equally true, namely, that this decision in America, such being the difference between the laws of the two countries, would be of no authority here. But assuming Tweed v. Lipscombe (7) to be an authority, what does it come to? It comes to this—that in prosecutions for misdemeanour in America you can only proceed for one offence upon each indictment, and if you desire to have cumulative punishment extending to more than one statutory punishment, you must bring more than one separate indictment. The inference which I draw from the words used by the two learned judges who decided that case is that you might have more than one penalty of the full amount tacked together, if you brought separate proceedings for that purpose. But in England it is not necessary to bring two separate proceedings in order to try one criminal for two misdemeanours, and I see no reason whatever, even if I accept that decision as law, for holding that if you can tack together two periods of the full amount of the prescribed sentence, one for each offence, when you try by separate indictments, the same may not be done when two offences are tried upon the same indictment. Still further, it appears to me among the cases cited at the Bar there is to be found, not only sufficient authority, but ample authority for the proposition that such a sentence is sustainable, and is good according to the law of England.

Had there been any serious doubt or difficulty attending these questions of criminal law which have been raised at the Bar, I should have given my opinion with very great hesitation and diffidence; but looking to the very unsubstantial character of the objections which have been stated to this conviction and sentence, I cannot say that I feel the least hesitation in giving my concurrence to the views which have been expressed by your Lordships.

Appeal dismissed.

INMAN STEAMSHIP CO. v. BISCHOFF

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn, Lord Watson and Lord FitzGerald), July 11, 14, 15, August 1, 1882]

[Reported 7 App. Cas. 670; 52 L.J.Q.B. 169; 47 L.T. 581;

Insurance—Marine insurance—Freight—Perils of the sea—Loss of freight—Exercise by charterers of special power under charterparty—Right to “put ship out of pay.”

By a charterparty dated Feb. 20, 1879, by which the Admiralty chartered for three months a steamship owned by the appellants, the owners covenanted that the ship should at all times during the continuance of the charter be in every respect seaworthy, and it was also provided that if at any time the ship became incapable, from any cause whatsoever, to perform efficiently the service contracted for, “it shall and may be lawful to and for the [charterers] . . . to put the ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable.” On Feb. 22 the appellants effected a time policy on “freight outstanding” against the ordinary marine perils including perils of the sea. On Mar. 21, during a voyage to South Africa, the ship struck a rock, and sustained damage which rendered her unfit to perform the chartered service. The charterers thereupon put her out of pay as respected the remaining period of the charter.

Held: the cause of the loss of freight was, not a peril of the sea, but the exercise by the charterers of the special power conferred on them by the charterparty; loss through the exercise of that power was a distinct and different risk from that of loss by perils of the sea; the appellants were insured against the latter risk but not against the former; and, therefore, they were not entitled to recover on the policy.

E

Per LORD BLACKBURN and LORD FITZGERALD: The freight was earned by the appellants and the fact that they were deprived of it under the provisions of the charterparty did not constitute a loss within the policy.

G Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., BAGGALLAY and BRAMWELL, L.JJ.), reported 6 Q.B.D. 648, reversing a decision of BRETT, L.J., in favour of the plaintiffs (the present appellants) at the trial of the action which was brought by the appellants, owners of a steamship, the City of Paris, against the respondents, who were underwriters of a policy on freight outstanding under a charterparty.

 Their Lordships took time for consideration.
 Aug. 1, 1882. The following opinions were read.

I LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—The question in this appeal is whether a loss of freight by the exercise of a power of mulct or abatement reserved by charterparty to the charterers, which power in this case arose and was exercised by reason of the ship being temporarily rendered inefficient for the service in which she was engaged by perils insured against, is a loss for which the insurers are liable, under an ordinary time policy "on freight outstanding." It has been held by the Court of Appeal that they are not so liable, on the ground that the perils insured against were not the proximate cause of the loss.

Although the charterparty is not mentioned in the policy, nor is the freight therein described as chartered freight, an insurance on freight must necessarily have reference to some contract of affreightment, under which, during the time covered by that policy, freight might be earned; and to ascertain what the freight insured was, in case of loss, the actual contract of affreightment must necessarily be regarded. In this case the insurers had express notice, by a letter of Feb. 19, 1879, in which the order for the insurance was given, that the City of Paris, the ship mentioned in the policy, was an Inman steamer, then about to proceed on a voyage to Natal on government charter. There were, at that time, hostilities in progress between this country and the chief of Zululand, and the government charter was for the use of the ship as a transport to convey troops and stores. That charter had reference to the general regulations for Her Majesty's transport service, and the special terms contained in it were in substance similar to those which had been long in use in government charters for similar purposes, as appears from Beatson v. Schank (1). Under these circumstances it appears to me that the question arising upon the policy ought to be determined in the same way as if the charterparty had been seen by the insurers, and referred to in the policy, though not, of course, so as to extend the contract of the underwriters by any unnecessary implication to anything not properly covered by the express terms of the policy.

The charterparty, dated Feb. 20, 1879, was for the service and employment of the ship as a transport, on monthly hire, for the term of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the Board of Admiralty should give notice of discharge, such notice to be given when the ship was in port within the United Kingdom. The shipowners contracted to keep the ship in every respect seaworthy and fit for the service in which she was engaged; and the Board of Admiralty agreed to pay for the hire and freight of the ship, at the rate of 25s. per ton per calendar month, during such time as the ship should be continued in Her Majesty's employ, and should duly and efficiently perform that service, upon certificates, and by monthly instalments, with certain reserves, in the manner therein mentioned, one month's freight being paid in advance. This agreement of the Board of Admiralty was, however, subject to a proviso, thus expressed :

"If at any time or times hereafter it shall be made to appear to the commissioners that any delay has been caused or has accrued by breach of orders, by neglect of duty, or that the said ship becomes incapable from any defect, deficiency, breach of orders, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform efficiently the service contracted for, then and in every such case it shall or may be lawful to and for the commissioners to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months . . . to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they should adjudge fit and reasonable."

Upon the construction of this charterparty, I am of opinion that it is not a condition precedent of the contract of the Board of Admiralty to pay the monthly hire and freight of the ship, that the ship should "duly and efficiently perform the service" for which she was engaged: Boone v. Eyre (2); Havelock v. Geddes (3). I am also of opinion that the ship could not be discharged from that service, without the consent of the shipowner, elsewhere than within some port of the United Kingdom; and that the power reserved to the commissioners to "put the ship out of pay," for any of the causes mentioned, had reference only to a retention of the monthly payments, which ought otherwise to have been made, so that no exercise of that power could result in a loss of freight. The power, therefore, upon the exercise of which the present question depends is that of making "such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship" as the commissioners should adjudge fit and reasonable, being the same power which in Beatson v. Schank (1) was adjudged by the Court of King's Bench to be valid in law. This, according to the terms of the charterparty, was a power depending upon a judgment to be exercised, not by any officer or officers in charge of troops or stores on board the ship, but by the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral.

A The facts which are material are these. The ship proceeded with troops and stores to Simon's Bay, and there, on Mar. 21, 1879, she struck a rock, receiving such serious injury that she was rendered unseaworthy and incapable of efficiently performing the service for which she was engaged, until she had received extensive repairs, which were not completed, so as to make her again seaworthy and fit to sail or to perform the service contracted for, until May 23 following, which was
B after the expiration of the time covered by the insurance. The freight down to Mar. 21, 1879, when she struck the rock, was duly paid. On April 17, 1879, Captain Adean, the senior naval officer in Simon's Bay, instead of granting the usual certificate on which monthly payments were to be made according to contract, noted, on the form provided for that purpose, that the ship had been "inefficient since Mar. 21, 1879, having touched the Roman rock and sustained much damage"; also C that the "City of Paris was discharged from Her Majesty's service on April 17, 1879, having been retained so long on account of removal of government stores, etc."

The troops and stores on board had, in fact, remained in the ship until they could conveniently be transferred to other vessels, an operation which was not completed by the local agents of the government until April 17, 1879. The agents of
D the government having declined to continue the employment of the ship, she returned to England in July, 1879, and a correspondence between her owners and the Board of Admiralty, or their solicitors, which had been commenced when she was on her voyage homeward, was continued till Aug. 2, 1879. The owners did not profess to be able to insist upon any legal claim, but they asked for equitable consideration from Her Majesty's government; and the Board of Admiralty ultimately decided to make them some allowance in respect of the expenses of the voyage homeward, but declined to pay freight for the period subsequent to Mar. 21, 1879.

Having regard to the construction and legal effect of the charterparty, it appears to me that the acts of Captain Adean at Simon's Bay and the form of certificate signed by him on April 17 may be laid out of the case, inasmuch as the charter-
F party did not authorise the Board of Admiralty, and still less authorised their local agents, to discharge the ship from the service in which she was engaged until she had returned to the United Kingdom, and the power of making an abatement by way of mulct out of freight was reserved only to the Board themselves, and cannot be regarded as having been finally exercised by them until after the ship's return to the United Kingdom. If the shipowners had voluntarily consented to a varia-
G tion of the terms of the charterparty, involving a relinquishment of their claim to freight (which does not appear to have been the case), this could not have thrown upon the insurers any liability to which they would not otherwise have been subject: Everth v. Smith (4); Philpott v. Swann (5). The result is that, in my opinion, a right to the freight in question must be deemed to have accrued under the terms of the charterparty, but to have been subsequently, in July, 1879, defeated under H the power of abatement by way of mulct reserved by the contract to the Board of Admiralty.

It has not been without doubt, or, I must add, without reluctance, that I have come to the conclusion that this is not a loss so directly, proximately, and immediately resulting from the perils of the seas insured against, so as to make it payable under the terms of the policy by the insurers. The general principle of causa
I proxima, non remota, spectatur is intelligible enough, and easy of application in many cases; but that there are cases in which a too literal application of it would work injustice, and would not really be justified by the principle itself, is apparent from the observations of POLLOCK, C.B., in Montoya v. London Assurance Co. (6), of ERLE, C.J., in Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Co. (7), and from Bondrett v. Hentigg (8). Nor do I think that the question can entirely depend upon the difference between a condition precedent (without which the right to freight would never accrue), and a condition subsequent, by which it might be defeated. The observations of BRAMWELL, B., at the conclusion of the judgment in Jackson v.

Union Marine Insurance Co. (9), and from what took place during the argument of that case, as stated by CLEASBY, B., appear to me to be adverse to so narrow a view. If, in the present case, the other terms of the charterparty being the same, a power had been reserved to the charterers or their agents to determine the contract and their liability to further freight on the occurrence of any such damage to the ship by perils of the sea as might render her inefficient for the service which she had undertaken, and if such power had been exercised before any further freight was earned, I should have been of opinion that this was a loss of freight by perils of the sea for which the insurers were liable. Nor would it, in my opinion, have made any difference, although provision might have been made by the contract for the continuance of the troops and stores in the ship, after the exercise of the power to determine the contract, until such time as they could be conveniently landed or transferred to other vessels.

But between such a case and that of a subsequent mulct under a special power, such as that contained in this charterparty, after freight had been earned which (unless the power of mulct were exercised) would be payable under the contract, there seems to me to be an important difference. The principle of such cases as Hadkinson v. Robinson (10), Taylor v. Dunbar (11), M'Swiney v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corpn. (12), seems to be here applicable, and obliges me to conclude that the risk of loss by the exercise, in such circumstances, of such a special power is different from the risk of loss by perils of the seas, and ought to have been insured against in some more special manner, if it was the intention of the parties that it should be covered by the policy. I do not dissemble that there appears to me to be something of refinement in the distinction which the rule laid down by the authorities, as applied to the particular facts of this case, obliges me to make; but, though refined, it seems to be a real distinction, and to justify the judgment of the court below. Upon the whole, therefore, I am unable to differ from the opinion which is entertained by others of your Lordships who heard this appeal, and I must move your Lordships to affirm the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN stated the facts and continued: In Flint v. Flemyng (13) LORD TENTERDEN said (1 B. & Ad. at p. 48):

"Freight as used in the policy of insurance, imports the benefit derived from the employment of the ship";

so that description covers the monthly hire of the ship for time. But as soon as it is ascertained that the policy attached on the hire under a particular charterparty, the charterparty must be read in order to see how the subject-matter was affected by the misfortune which happened. Under one charterparty a temporary disablement of the ship might occasion a loss for which the underwriters on ship would be responsible, but which would not have any effect at all on the insured's right to recover the hire of the vessel while she was disabled. Under another, such a temporary disablement might deprive the shipowner of all claim for hire during the time she was disabled. In the first of these cases there could be no claim against the underwriters on freight, for there was no loss of freight. In the second, I do not see how it could properly be denied that there was such a loss. But the construction of the charterparty may be such, and this is the case now at Bar, that it is a nice question whether the pecuniary loss which the assured have sustained in consequence of a peril of the sea is one which does or does not occasion a loss of the hire. If it does not occasion such a loss, though the consequence may be one which might have been insured against by an apt description, the underwriters on freight have not insured against it. Whether the individuals who subscribed this policy would have refused to insure at all on such a risk as being too speculative for them, or would have been willing to insure on an increased premium, I cannot tell. If what has happened is not a loss of freight within the meaning of the policy, they have a right to refuse to indemnify against it. The construction, therefore, of this charterparty is all important. I may observe that I do not think that it makes

A any difference in its construction that the charterers here are acting on behalf of Her Majesty, and that the regulations of Her Majesty's transport service are incorporated in and form part of the charterparty, and that two cases, Beatson v. Schank (1) and Havelock v. Geddes (3) are very material authorities as to the principles upon which it should be construed.

B The owners say, and, it seems clear, say truly, that had it not been for the accident, which was a peril of the sea, they would have received pay from Mar. 21, 1879, till May 20, 1879, when the policy expired by effluxion of time, and that they did not receive it at all; and they claim against the underwriters on freight to be indemnified against this. BRETT, L.J., was of this opinion, and the plaintiffs before him had judgment against the underwriters. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. It is clear that the pecuniary damage to the assured was precisely the same whether the hire for these two months was, in consequence of the perils of the sea, never earned, or whether the commissioners had, in consequence of the perils of the sea, a right to make abatement by way of mulct to such amount as in their judgment was fit and reasonable, and to deduct that from the pay, and thought it fit and reasonable to deduct the whole. But the difference to the underwriters is considerable. In the first case the hire is clearly lost by the peril insured against. In the other I think it cannot properly be said that the hire has been lost at all, though the assured have had an equivalent mulct levied out of it.

C The courts below have not entered into the question what was the construction of the charterparty in any detail, BRAMWELL, L.J., in the Court of Appeal rather putting the judgment on the maxim causa proxima, non causa remota, spectatur, which is, no doubt, perfectly good law, and saying something about causa causans, and causa sine qua non. I must own that I have always sympathised with what LORD COLONSAY said in Rankin v. Potter (14) (L.R. 6 H.L. at p. 160):

E "Something is said about proximate and remote causes, and these are matters which are very apt to lead us into philosophical mazes"; which I think he did not use as a term of eulogy. I think, as he did, that when we get a clear view of the facts it is best to keep out of such philosophical mazes; and, as I think, the question here is not what was the proximate cause of a loss of freight, but whether there was any loss of freight. It seems to me clear that neither Captain Adean at the Cape nor the commissioners at home, nor anyone else, had power to discharge the City of Paris before the three months certain for which she was hired. Had she totally perished, so that she never could have been employed again at all, the hire would have ceased from the time of her destruction; but here use was made of her as a storeship till April 17, and after she was repaired she was capable of performing the work of a transport efficiently.

G In Havelock v. Geddes (3), where by the terms of the charterparty the defendants had bound themselves to pay a monthly hire, and the shipowners had, as here, covenanted, without any exception of the perils of the sea, to keep the vessel efficient, LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., says (10 East, at p. 566):

H "The question then is whether, because the plaintiff has undertaken to keep the vessel tight, etc., the defendants have a right to deduct anything out of the freight they are to pay, in respect of the time which may be taken up in making good such defects as may occur during the period for which the vessel is hired? And we are of opinion that they are not. From the accidents to which ships are liable, it was in the ordinary course of things to expect that this ship might want repairs in the course of her voyage, and when the defendants were making their bargain they should have stipulated to deduct for the time which might be exhausted in making these repairs, if they meant to make that deduction. Without such a stipulation, we think the true construction of the charterparty is that while these repairs are going on the ship is to be considered as in the defendants' service, and the defendants liable to continue their payments."

I No question as to insurance arose in that case, but it seems to me clear that, if the plaintiff had insured his freight he could not have recovered anything in respect of the peril of the sea causing the necessity for those repairs, for no part of the freight was thereby lost; any damage to the ship would be borne by the underwriters on ship; any extra expenses to which he was put in consequence of his covenant would have to be insured by a special description. A

It is, however, argued that in this charterparty the words in the covenant to pay the freight

“during such time as the ship shall be continued in Her Majesty’s employ, and shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged,” B

amount to such a stipulation as LORD ELLENBOROUGH refers to. In MAUDE AND POLLOCK ON SHIPPING (3rd Edn.) at p. 235, it is said, I think quite accurately:

“It is often difficult in construing charterparties to ascertain whether particular stipulations amount to conditions precedent. This is to be determined by seeking for the intention of the parties as apparent on the instrument, and from the surrounding circumstances, and by applying the ordinary rules of construction to each particular case. It does not depend on any formal arrangement of the words, but on the reason and sense of the thing as it is collected from the whole contract. Generally speaking, any stipulation which goes only to a portion of the consideration, or, in other words, the breach of which would deprive the party who has a right to insist upon it of a portion only of the benefit of his contract, will be construed not to be a condition precedent. It must, however, be recollected that this rule, although a very useful one, is only a rule of construction, or means of discovering the intention of the parties, to be applied where the words will bear either sense. For it is clear that the courts will not make contracts for the parties, and that if they use language which distinctly shows that they intend such a stipulation to be a condition precedent, it will be so construed. Constructions, however, tending to absurd and unreasonable results, will be avoided, if this can be without violence to the terms used, because, where the intention is not clearly expressed, the parties are not to be presumed to have meant to make an absurd or unreasonable contract.” C D E F

In this case the government did receive some benefit from the employment of the ship between Mar. 21 and April 17, though she was disabled from duty and efficiently performing the service for which she was engaged; and cases may easily be supposed in which they might have received more. I am, therefore, strongly inclined to think that the words relied on, even if they stood alone, would not amount to a condition precedent. But it is not necessary to decide the point, for the words are materially qualified and their effect altered by what follows, which shows that the charterers were relying upon the stipulation mentioned in Beatson v. Shank (1). There in a transport charter, the provision, as stated in the report, was that G

“upon the loss of time, breach of orders, or neglect of duty by the said master, or from the ship’s inability to execute or proceed on the service in which she might be employed, being made to appear, the said commissioners should have free liberty and be permitted to mulct or make such abatement out of the freight and pay of the ship as should be by them adjudged fit and reasonable.” H

The words in the charterparty now before us are slightly different, and there is introduced a power to the commissioners to I

“retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months, as aforesaid, and to put the ship out of pay,” which, as I think, must be construed as enabling them, not to discharge the ship, but to withhold the giving of the monthly bills previously stipulated for for two months, during which time the commissioners would have time to consider how they should use the power to make abatement by way of mulct out of the pay.

- A I think that Beatson v. Schank (1) puts the proper construction upon this clause. If any of the specified cases, including inability from any cause whatever to perform efficiently the service contracted for, arises, the parties have agreed that the commissioners may make such abatement by way of mulct as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable. All that a court of law can inquire into is whether there was such a case as to give the commissioners jurisdiction; if there was, even if they make an
- B abatement which in the opinion of the court was neither fit nor reasonable, the court cannot interfere, and I think that the commissioners may properly take into consideration many things besides the mere inability, so that it is not at all clear that the resolution to pay nothing for the period from Mar. 21 to April 17, though the ship was then retained in the service, and actually used, might not be reasonable and fit, though it certainly seemed to me at first to be an inequitable resolution.
- C But can it be said that the making such an abatement by way of mulct or fine, not necessarily because of the peril of the sea, is a loss of the freight, though power is given to retain and levy it out of the freight? I think not, any more than the power conferred on the Admiralty Court to give damages against the ship for a collision occasioning damage to another ship, and to enforce the payment by a proceeding in rem against the ship, is a loss of the ship. That was De Vaux v. Salvador (15). The prejudice which the owner of the ship sustains in the last case is a consequence of the peril of the sea, the collision, and it may be, and every day is, insured against by a collision or running-down clause now in common use, but it is not a loss of the ship.

It may be doubted whether the prejudice which the shipowners in this case sustained from the abatement by way of mulct is so direct and immediate a consequence, for it may have been imposed, or at least its amount increased, for many other reasons, and it might be difficult, though I think it possible, to frame a clause to cover it. But I think that it should be insured against, if at all, under a clause framed for the purpose, as it is not a loss of freight. I, therefore, think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, and should be affirmed.

- F LORD WATSON.—The terms of the policy of Feb. 22, 1879, appear to me to be sufficient to include freight to be earned under a time charter, and seeing that the respondents, when they accepted the insurance, had notice that the City of Paris was under a contract of charterparty, I am of opinion that the policy attached to the freight therein stipulated for, whether they did or did not choose to inform themselves of the particulars of the contract, and consequently that the respondents
- G became liable for such part of that freight as might be lost by any of the risks insured against during the period covered by the policy. There are two facts in the present case which have not been disputed. The first of these is that the injury sustained by the vessel in Simon's Bay, and her consequent detention there while undergoing necessary repairs, were due to perils of the seas within the meaning of the policy. The second is that the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who
- H were the charterers, have not paid, and refuse to pay, freight subsequent to Mar. 21, 1879.

Accordingly, the only question which arises for decision is whether the freight, which the vessel, in the absence of any casualty, would have earned between Mar. 21 and May 19, 1879, is lost freight for which the insurers are liable. In order to appreciate the merits of that question, it is necessary to consider very carefully

I the terms of the charterparty. The engagement of the vessel was for an indefinite period, three calendar months being the minimum. Notice of discharge was only to be given when the vessel was in a port in the United Kingdom, and the owners were bound to keep her "staunch and substantial both above water and beneath, and in every respect seaworthy," at all times during the continuance of her charter. These stipulations seem to indicate that it was within the contemplation of both parties that the owners should from time to time, during the currency of the charterparty, make such repairs upon the ship as were necessary to her efficiency as a transport. The clauses of the charterparty which bear upon the payment of freight are somewhat peculiar, and the decision of the present case appears to me to depend upon the effect to be given to them. Freight is made payable at a monthly tonnage rate, during the time that the ship is in Her Majesty's employ, and "shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged." The first month's freight is to be paid in advance. At the end of the second month the owner, on producing a certificate in due form, is entitled to a bill for a moiety of a month's freight; and at the end of the third month, upon production of a similar certificate, he becomes entitled to a bill for another moiety. At the end of the fourth and each succeeding month a bill for one month's freight is receivable upon a certificate being produced. The result of this arrangement is that, after the expiration of the first three months, the charterers have always from one to two months' freight already earned in their hands; and it is provided that the owner

"shall be paid the balance of freight on the passing in the office of the requisite accounts and documents after the discharge of the said ship."

Then follows the provision that if it shall be made to appear at any time to the commissioners that any delay has been caused by breach of orders, or that the ship became incapable from any cause whatsoever to perform efficiently the service contracted for, it shall be lawful for them "to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months as aforesaid, and to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable."

If the facts of the present case were such as to bring it within the principle of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (9) that would afford an easy solution of the only question in issue. In that event the Commissioners of the Admiralty would have been, at common law, entitled to rescind the contract of charterparty, in respect that the sea risk encountered by the City of Paris in Simon's Bay had made the object which the contracting parties had in view commercially impossible of attainment. But there is really no analogy between the case of a charter for a single voyage with a particular cargo, and that of a charter indefinite as to time, place, and cargo; and, moreover, it appears to me that, on a fair interpretation of this charterparty, it was mutually contemplated that the ship might be injured by perils of the seas, and that, whenever that occurred, she was to be repaired. In my opinion, neither the Commissioners of the Admiralty, nor their officials at Simon's Bay, had a legal right to terminate the contract and to discharge the City of Paris from Her Majesty's service on April 17, 1879. It is, however, unnecessary to consider whether any liability would have attached to the insurers if the commissioners had insisted upon their right to discharge the vessel upon April 17, and had declined to pay freight upon that footing alone. The commissioners ultimately disallowed all claims for freight after Mar. 21, but allowed the cost of coals consumed on the homeward voyage, and the case was presented to your Lordships as if the commissioners had not discharged the vessel at Simon's Bay, but had disallowed freight from and after Mar. 21 in consequence of her inefficiency to perform the service for which she had been engaged.

In this aspect of the case it could hardly be maintained that the commissioners were not empowered by the terms of the charterparty to refuse payment of freight subsequent to Mar. 21, 1879; but, when that is conceded, the question still remains whether the payments so withheld constitute lost freight within the meaning of the policy. The appellants in the first place maintain that, by the terms of the charterparty, the due and efficient performance of the service for which the vessel was engaged formed a condition precedent to the earning of freight. I am unable so to read the contract. The language of the leading clause with respect to freight does not appear to me to be fairly susceptible of that construction, and any such construction is quite inconsistent with the clause which follows giving power to the commissioners to make an abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the ship. Reading the two clauses together, I think it is clear that freight was to run during the whole period of the vessel's engagement, but that the commissioners,

A in the event of delay occurring, or of the vessel becoming inefficient, were to have the power of declining to issue monthly pay bills (which I take to be what is meant by putting the ship out of pay), and of retaining the freight, deducting from its amount on final settlement any sum which they in their discretion might fix as a reasonable mulct in respect of such delay or inefficiency.

B If I am right in my construction of the charterparty the case turns upon a very narrow point. The inefficiency of the vessel was admittedly due to perils of the sea, which were within the risk insured by the policy, and, if it had been expressly stipulated in the charterparty that freight should cease to be payable so long as the ship was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her contract, I do not doubt that the insurers would have been liable. That would have been a plain case of cesser or loss of freight by the perils insured against, but that is not the present case. The abatement of freight is not, in my opinion, necessarily dependent upon the fact that the vessel had been disabled by sea risks, but it is entirely dependent upon the discretion of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who are not limited in the exercise of that discretion to considerations arising out of the casualty which has occasioned delay. They may quite legitimately take into account, in determining whether they will or will not inflict a mulct, the conduct of her owners under a totally different contract of charterparty, and many other considerations equally foreign to the ship or freight insured. In these circumstances, while I am conscious that the question is one of great nicety, I am unable to regard a disallowance of freight, which may be legitimately made on such considerations, as lost freight in the proper sense of the term. It appears to me that the deduction from freight, which the commissioners are empowered to make, is in truth and substance a penalty imposed upon the shipowner, which they are entitled to levy out of the freight retained in their hands. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

F LORD FITZGERALD.—The judgments of my noble and learned friends have my entire concurrence. As the charter was not limited in time, and might continue for a considerable period, it seems plain that its duration was not to be determined by any necessity arising for repairs, unless at least the repairs proved to be of so extensive a character, and likely to occupy so much time, as practically to put an end to the objects of the charter, and thus entitle the charterers to abandon the undertaking. The proviso so much commented on, which is the foundation of your Lordships' judgment, seems to me to have conferred on the commissioners large powers of a judicial character, to be exercised according to judicial discretion. They do not seem, either by themselves or their officers, to have directly and formally exercised those powers. It is not pretended that they determined to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months, and to put the ship out of pay; nor did they formally and directly adjudge and declare that it would be fit and reasonable to make any abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the ship. I have not been able to discover that Captain Adean had authority to discharge the ship from the service. Under such circumstances I should have had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the commissioners had legally exercised the powers conferred on them by the contract of affreightment, and had adjudged it to be fit and reasonable that there should be a mulct out of the freight. It seems, however, to be assumed on both sides that the commissioners did, in some form or other, exercise their powers, and did eventually adjudge it to be fit and reasonable to make, and did make, an abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight equivalent to the two months' freight which had otherwise been earned. It is on this that the plaintiffs seek to maintain the present action.

I I concur in the opinion that there has been no loss of freight within the terms of the policy. The freight was earned, but the plaintiffs have been deprived of it by the commissioners, in the exercise of the discretionary powers which the contract of affreightment vested in them. That was a risk against which the insurers did not insure. If, however, there was a loss of freight, it would remain to be considered whether "peril of the sea" was the immediate cause of the loss. The maxim, in jure non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur, applies specially to marine insurances, so that in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover here the loss must be a direct, and not a remote consequence of the peril of the sea. The touching on the Roman rock was a peril of the sea, and probably but for that the ship would have completed her undertaking and earned her two months' freight, but it does not follow that the touching on the rock and consequent injury were the causa causans. The freight was not necessarily and directly lost by that calamity, and the consequent necessity for repairs. The plaintiffs were deprived of their right to the freight, if they were so deprived, by the action of the commissioners, or their officers, under the special provisions of the charterparty. The loss was not by the perils of the sea, but was occasioned by the contract. I concur in the opinion of BRAMWELL, L.J., in this case, that the loss was not the necessary and proximate effect of the perils of the sea, and that the plaintiffs have failed to establish the immediate relation of the one to the other.

Appeal dismissed.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Field and Cave, JJ.), June 13, 16, 1882]

[Reported 9 Q.B.D. 357; 51 L.J.Q.B. 543; 47 L.T. 10;

Statute—Contracting out of operation—Prohibition—Express or to be implied from language of statute.

Fatal Accident—Widow—Action by—Action barred by conduct which would have barred action by husband in lifetime.

By an agreement entered into between a workman, the husband of the plaintiff, his widow, and the defendant, his employer, the workman undertook, in the event of his receiving personal injury to look for compensation to a fund to which he and the employer both contributed, and that he would not claim compensation under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The workman having been killed in the course of his employment, his widow brought an action against his employer under s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1864, and the Act of 1880.

Held: (i) in the absence of express provision forbidding contracting out of a statute, or necessary implication from the language of the statute to that effect, a person could enter into a binding contract not to claim benefits conferred by the statute; in the Act of 1880 there was no such prohibitory provision, express or implied; and, therefore, the agreement between the deceased workman and his employer was not invalid; (ii) the right of the widow to bring the action under the Act of 1864 was a matter of procedure only and not a personal right, and so she was barred by conduct of her husband which would have barred an action by him in his lifetime; accordingly, in the present case she was barred by the agreement entered into by her husband with his employer from maintaining an action under the Act of 1880 against the employer.

- F Appeal by the defendant against a decision of Dudley, Worcestershire, County Court, in favour of the plaintiff, a widow, in an action brought by her, under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 & 1864, and the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 [repealed by the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948], to recover damages from the defendant, as compensation for the loss and injury sustained by her and her children in the death of her husband, a workman in the employ of the defendant, through an accident caused by the negligence of another workman, employed by the defendant as machinery inspector, in failing to see that the machinery and plant at the defendant's collieries, where the deceased man was employed, were in a safe and proper condition, in consequence of which neglect of duty an accident occurred which resulted in the deceased's death.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 16, 1882. The following judgments were read.

- I FIELD, J.—In this case a rule was obtained by counsel, on behalf of the defendant (Lord Dudley), calling on the plaintiff to show cause why judgment should not be entered for the defendant, or why there should not be a new trial on the ground of misdirection and error in law on the part of the learned county court judge in deciding that the defendant was liable, and that the deceased man, Griffiths, did not, and had no power to, contract, on behalf of himself or of his personal representatives, that the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, should not apply in his case; and, further, on the ground also that such a contract was void for want of mutuality or consideration, and also as being against public policy. The case is a most important one, and the Act of Parliament which we are called on to construe is a very important and a very useful one, and one upon which it is most desirable that, so far as this court can make it clear, there should be no element of doubt or uncertainty with regard to its effect and operation. A

The facts of the present case, which it is material I should state at first starting, are sufficiently clear. The plaintiff sues, not in her representative capacity as the administratrix or executrix of her deceased husband, but as his widow; and she claims as such widow to be entitled, in default of the personal representatives suing, to maintain an action against the defendant to recover damages for the pecuniary loss and injury sustained by her and her children in consequence of her husband's death—a right given to her by the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 and 1864. The deceased man was a workman in the employ of the defendant, the Earl of Dudley, who is a very extensive mine and colliery owner, with a very numerous body of workmen in his employ. It appears that at the mines and collieries belonging to Lord Dudley the following system, by which his workmen are taught and encouraged to be prudent and thrifty, has for a great many years been established and acted on. There is a box called "The Field Club Box," or "The Field Box," to which every workman in the defendant's employ is expected to, and as a matter of fact does, contribute, out of his earnings, a small sum weekly, and, whatever the total amount of such contributions may be, Lord Dudley adds out of his own pocket an equal sum, thus doubling the total amount collected. The fund or money thus subscribed and raised is applied under the supervision, and at the discretion, as to amount, of the colliery managers, in whom the workmen place entire and implicit confidence, for the benefit of the workmen, in providing surgical and medical aid, a weekly sick allowance in case of accident or illness in the course of their work, funeral expenses in case of death, and an allowance to the widow and family of a workman killed when engaged in his employment. B C D E

This state of things had been in existence at the collieries long before the passing of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The general object of that Act clearly was to avoid the absolute injustice arising to workmen from the then state of the law on the subject, by which an employer, unless he had himself been guilty of actual personal negligence, was held not to be liable to a workman in his employ for injuries sustained by the latter in the course of his employment. If the employers knew that the plant upon which a workman was to be engaged at work was out of order, and the workman did not know of it, it was clear, even before the Employers' Liability Act, that a duty was cast upon the master to keep the plant in order, and he would, therefore, be liable; but it was also clear, and remains clear now, that, for the negligence of a fellow-workman, not being a person described in the sections of the Act as one intrusted with general superintendence or management, the master was not, and is not now, liable [The doctrine of common employment was abolished as a defence by the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948]. Wilson v. Merry (1), however, in the House of Lords, finally decided, that a person put by the employer in his own place to superintend and manage the whole of the work, whatever it might be, was nevertheless a fellow-servant of the workmen, and that an injured workman, therefore, could not recover damages from the master for injuries arising from the negligence of such superintendent, although similar negligence on the part of the master himself, resulting in injury to a workman, would have given such workman a right of action. It was the object and intention of the Act of 1880, as is clearly shown by its language, to remedy that evil and injustice, to remove the obstacle to recovery of compensation arising merely from the fact of the injured person being in the service or employment of the person against whom he brought his action, and also to avoid the injustice arising in cases where workmen were injured or killed in consequence of the negligence of persons in the position of foremen and superintendents under the employers, and where, before the Act, no remedy existed. Upon the Act coming into operation, if no contract had been made between the deceased man and the defendant, his employer, without doubt the deceased would have been entitled to the benefit of all its provisions, because I think the object and intention of the Act were to get rid F G H I

A of the inference arising from the mere fact of service and employment, and not in any way to get rid of an absolute and express contract.

What happened here when this Act came into operation? Lord Dudley, it appears, determined not to employ any persons in his mines and collieries who were not willing to enter into or to continue in his employ under the terms and conditions of the printed notice referred to in the case. I do not say that he
B determined this autocratically and without consulting his workmen, for the men held meetings and came to the conclusion that it was desirable to go on upon the old system regarding the "Field Box"—at all events it is clear that the deceased man Griffiths assented to, and was willing to, and did, continue in or enter into his employment at the collieries upon these terms, and it is also perfectly clear that these terms do expressly stipulate and contract that neither the workman nor his
C representatives, nor any person entitled at his death to look to the funds of the "Field Box" for compensation in case of injury or death, shall look to Lord Dudley for compensation in any such case. There is no suggestion or allegation of fraud or duress of any kind in the matter, neither was it a mere naked bargain without consideration; on the contrary, the defendant puts his hand into his pocket every year for the purpose of doubling the fund which the thrifty workman is willing to D lay by. It is clear that the deceased was ready and willing to relinquish his rights under the Act of 1880 in consideration of the benefits accruing to him under the terms and conditions of service to which he agreed, and on which he was content to stand; and by those terms he could not, had he survived, have sought compensation from the defendant under the Act. The contract into which he entered seems to me to be a very sensible and reasonable one, and founded upon abundant and E very good consideration.

Under these circumstances, then, the deceased workman sustained injuries in the course of his employment from which he died, and thereupon his widow, the plaintiff, brought the present action, which was tried before a very learned and honoured county court judge, who took a view of the statute in which, upon the whole, I am unable to concur. First, he held that in this particular case the contract
F was void for want of mutuality and consideration. The entry into the service is clear, and though there is nothing in writing by the workman, yet the entry into the service and being allowed to serve on the terms of the printed notice is abundant consideration; and the plaintiff's counsel did not press the point, which is clearly untenable, and though he took it, as in duty bound to do, he very properly abandoned it. Secondly, the county court judge held that the contract
G was void, as being against public policy. The only public policy that can be suggested in the present case is the interest of the employed; and it is said, if I apprehend the argument aright, that, the intention of the Act and of the legislature being such as it is supposed, and as I have before stated it to be, that intention will be entirely frustrated, and it would be contrary to the public interests of the realm, if workpeople were to be allowed to enter into such a contract as this.
H Why? I do not myself see why it is that a workman is always to be put upon so low a stage. My experience of them as a body is that as a general rule they are very intelligent people, who understand their own interests exceedingly well, perhaps quite as well as those above them in the social scale, and that they are quite able to make reasonable and sensible contracts. No doubt sometimes their wage is low and their quantity of service is great, and they may occasionally be placed in a position of hardship in being obliged to accept what is not a good contract or to go without work. To such an extent, perhaps, it may be said that a contract of this kind might interfere with public policy. But in this particular instance, this contract, so far from frustrating the intention of the Act or being antagonistic to the interest of the workman, is, in my judgment, quite the contrary. It advances a thrifty policy, and is calculated to teach and induce the workmen to be prudent and saving, and I see no ground on which it can be brought within any principle opposed to either public or private policy or interest.

Thirdly, it was held by the county court judge that, although the deceased man, A had he lived, might himself have been precluded by his contract from maintaining an action under the Act, yet that he could not, as it is called, "contract his widow out of the Act," or contract, as it is said, against her. A man who contracts, contracts for himself and his own acts, and his representatives are bound by his acts; his administratrix or his executrix is clearly bound by them. But it is said that the widow comes in as of a new right, quite distinct from and independent of B that of her husband or his representatives. There is no doubt a good deal in that argument. The language of the statute, without doubt, gives to the widow a right to sue independently of her representative character as executrix or administratrix, for the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, s. 2, provides that the action shall be brought in the name of the executor or administrator of the deceased person for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, or child of the deceased person, and then C the amending Act of 1864, by s. 1, goes a step further, and says that, in case no action be brought by the executor or administrator within six months after the death, then it may be brought in the name of all or any of the persons, if more than one, for whose benefit the action would have been if it had been brought by the executor. There is no doubt, therefore, that to that extent a right is given D to the widow to sue, but that is only a mode of procedure. It does not give her a new independent and individual right. It is procedure merely. The executors might take a different view of the matter from the widow; they might perhaps think that the defendant was not liable, or they might hesitate about incurring the costs of an action with a small estate; therefore, it was thought right to make her the person to move in the matter in their default, but not thereby to give her any new right. That that is so is clearly established by Read v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (2) in which it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the widow E was barred by an act of her deceased husband in his lifetime, which was a bar to him. That can, of course, only be because she took to that extent the right under him, but in respect of injury to him she was barred by a contract made by him.

We are now brought to the last point, viz., whether by the language of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, itself the defendant is not precluded from setting F up the contract as a defence to the action. I thought at the time, and I think now, that the language of s. 1 of the Act is not free from doubt, but I think it would be construing the statute too closely to draw the inference from the words in question which I at one time thought might be drawn from them. The way in which the construction that for a short time I thought might be put upon the statute occurred to me was, that the doctrine of Priestley v. Fowler (3) was not G founded upon fraud or compulsion, or anything of that sort, but upon contract. It was there held that, from the mere fact that the relation of employer and workman existed, the necessary implication was that on entering the service there was an implied contract that the workman should not look to the master for compensation in the case of accidents in his employment. Then the words of the section in question are that a workman injured H "shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of, the employer, nor engaged in his work."

At first I thought that might mean, if one took him, as being a workman, out of the service; then, of course, an express contract would not alter that in any way. I and could not carry it further than an implied one. But, as CAVE, J., pointed out during the argument, the workman himself is obliged to rely on those words. because, in this present case, if he had not held the relation of workman to Lord Dudley, he would have had no action at all. It is not pretended that he was a volunteer, or that he was invited to come; it was by reason of his contract to do the defendant's work that he was there. Therefore, one of the elements of his own proof is that he was a workman; and to strike out the words "as if he was not a workman, etc.," would be cutting away his ground of action altogether. for

A it was only by reason of his being a workman that he was lawfully on the premises. My doubt arose merely from the peculiar language of the section.

But, independently of that peculiar language, I think it is better to take a broad view of an Act of Parliament, and see whether we can discover in it what the real intention of the legislature was. The intention of the legislature, as expressed generally by the Act, was, it seems to me, that in cases where the master or his representative, as defined by the Act, had been guilty of negligence resulting in injury to the workman, then the injured workman should have his remedy and be entitled to maintain an action for the recovery of damages against his employer, without being met by the answer on the part of the latter that the negligence was that of a fellow-workman and not of the employer. For that purpose this was the mode adopted for expressing that view. The language of the Act does not go far enough to oblige us to say that freedom of contract is forbidden by the Act; and I am fortified in that view by a reference to the different Acts of Parliament in which the legislature have expressed their determination and will that a man shall not make a contract in defiance of that which public policy requires. As a general rule, I think right is required. As a general rule, too, the law of this country absolutely respects freedom of contract; but at times the legislature has come to the conclusion that a great public interest is to be served, or a great public injustice avoided, by preventing certain persons from making contracts contrary to these general rules. Where the legislature has done this, as in the Ground Game Act, 1880, the old Landlord and Tenant Act, the Truck Act, and in various other instances, it has done so expressly. There is nothing of that kind here. It is also a perfectly legitimate rule of construction to see what the consequences of any particular decision are likely to be, and, if it appears that a given construction would be likely to lead to injustice, it is not, of course, to be presumed that the legislature used doubtful or ambiguous language with the intention of creating such a result; but it is no reason for the court not carrying out a statutory provision, clearly and unambiguously expressed, that it seems to be unjust; and if there is no doubt in the language used, the consequences, whatever they may be, must be put up with.

In the present case it would, I think, tend to great injustice if the suggested doubtful construction of the section in question were to prevail. The strongest argument to my mind in favour of the view taken by the county court judge, and urged before us today by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, is the known desire of the legislature to protect workmen of all classes. There is no question about that. Late hours, fenced machinery, education, factory labour, employment of children; all these are cases in which the legislature has afforded protection. For wise and good purposes undoubtedly Parliament has taken care of certain classes of people, and intends that they shall have the full benefit of that legislation. If one could see that, by putting the construction upon this statute which I think we ought to put, a large class of workmen would be deprived of any just protection which the legislature clearly intended to give them, that would be a strong argument and reason for our not so construing the Act; but it is not sufficiently clear that that would be so, nor do I see enough in the arguments advanced on behalf of the plaintiff to justify the court in interfering with the broad principle of freedom of contract, or laying down as law that workmen are not at liberty to contract for themselves, unless the legislature has, in clear, express, and unmistakable terms, prohibited them from so doing. On the above grounds and for the above reasons, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's action is not maintainable, and that the judgment of the learned county court judge in his favour must be reversed and judgment be entered for the defendant.

I CAYE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The short point in this case is whether a workman can contract himself, his representatives, and his wife and family, out of the benefits of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The plaintiff's husband did so contract himself, and it has been contended for the plaintiff that that contract is, on four grounds, no answer to the action brought by her as his widow. A

First, it was said that there was no mutuality—no consideration for the contract. That point, however, was given up by counsel for the plaintiff in the course of the argument. It is quite untenable, and it is unnecessary to say any more about it. Secondly, it was said that such a contract was against public policy. No authority, however, was cited in support of that proposition, and I am not able B myself to see that such a contract is at all against public policy. Certainly it is a view of the matter which should not be held by us, unless we were perfectly satisfied that the case fell within the lines of the old decisions upon that point. Freedom of contract ought not to be narrowed by the judges upon their view of what public policy is, unless they are perfectly clear that they are acting, in so narrowing it, within the lines which have been laid down by the old cases on C the subject. To my mind the present case does not at all fall within those old lines, and, therefore, I reject that second contention of the plaintiff also.

Thirdly, it was said that, although a workman may be entitled to bargain away his own personal rights under the Act, he is not entitled to bargain away the rights of his wife and family. With regard to that argument, heretofore, before the Fatal Accidents Acts, a man who had sustained personal injuries through an accident and died left behind him nothing in respect of which his representatives D could sue for damages, unless there was damage caused by the accident and his death to his personal estate, in which case a cause of action survived to his personal representatives, but, in respect of an injury to his person only, no cause of action survived. This was thought, and not unreasonably, to be unjust and hard in the case of a person who thus met with his death and left persons in certain E degrees of relationship surviving him, and consequently the legislature interfered, and passed the Act of Parliament known as Lord Campbell's Act, whereby, by way of substitution for that part of the right of action which up to that time died with the decease of the injured person, a right to bring an action for the recovery of damages was given to his family—persons, that is, standing in certain degrees of relationship to him. Whether that was a new and an independent right given to F the family of the deceased, or whether it was simply in substitution of the right which would have existed in the man himself had he survived, has been decided already by the Court of Queen's Bench in Read v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (2), and by that case we are bound. Several cases, viz., Blake v. Midland Rail. Co. (4); Bradshaw v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (5); Leggott v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (6); and Pym v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (7) were cited before us by G counsel for the plaintiff as being inconsistent with the decision in Read v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (2), but, for myself, I am entirely unable to say that they are inconsistent with that decision, and I am of opinion that Read's Case (2) is still binding upon us, and that we are, therefore, bound to decide in accordance with it.

Then comes the last point, arising upon the language of s. 1 of the Act of 1880, which, it has been argued for the plaintiff, prohibits the making of any contract H which shall be capable of being used or set up as an answer or defence to an action by a workman against an employer under the Act. I quite agree that the language of this section is very far from being happily chosen. What the section says is this:

"Where after the commencement of this Act personal injury is caused to a workman [he] shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against I the employer as if [he] had not been a workman or nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

If that were taken in its apparently literal sense, it would follow that the plaintiff's deceased husband must be regarded as a stranger. He was on the defendant's premises, when he met with the accident, by virtue of his contract of service, and by virtue of that only, and he was there for the purpose of performing the work which he had contracted to do, and for that purpose only; and, if he is to be

- A regarded as not having been a workman, nor in the service of the defendant, the employer, nor engaged in his work, it follows that he was on the premises as a trespasser, or at most as a mere licensee—not there under any contract, nor there in the performance of some work in which both parties were interested. The result of that in this and the vast majority of such cases would be that no action whatever could be maintained.
- B It is impossible to suppose that such a result was intended by the legislature. What was considered was this. As far back as the decision in Priestley v. Fowler (3) it was held, and it continued thenceforward to be held, that a workman should not be able to sue his master for injuries sustained through the negligence of a fellow-workman, and the courts have expressed that in a way which is usual in courts of common law, viz., they have held that there was an implied contract
- C between the master and the workman to that effect. In the courts of common law there has always been some hesitation in laying down a liability as existing in any other way than by way of contract or as a tort; and, inasmuch as this could not be said to be a tort, there were numberless liabilities which it was desired should be established to be by contract. Then, where there was no express contract, the contract received the name of implied contract, which means simply
- D legal liability having a very strong resemblance in its incidents and character to the liability which arises out of an express contract. That doctrine, as laid down in Priestley v. Fowler (3), was subsequently extended in Wilson v. Merry (1), and extended beyond the mere fact of injury arising from the negligence of what one would call simply a “fellow-workman” to that of injury caused by the negligence of a foreman or superintendent in the service of the employers.
- E After a time it began to be thought that it was not expedient, or for the public advantage, that that doctrine should any longer prevail, and consequently the Employers’ Liability Act, 1880, was passed for the expressed purpose of removing the obstacle which had been placed by the decision in Wilson v. Merry (1) in the way of a workman’s recovering damages from his employer, in a case where the injury had been occasioned otherwise than by the negligence of a fellow-servant
- F pure and simple. That statute consequently provided that in five specified classes of cases a workman might bring his action “as if he had not been a workman,” which I take to mean nothing more than this—that when a workman brings his action within these five specified cases, the employer shall not be at liberty to say; “You occupied the position of a workman in my service and, therefore, you must be taken to have impliedly contracted to bear the consequences arising from
- G the negligence of your fellow-workmen in these five cases.” The legislature has said that that shall not be the legal result of the position of workman and employer, or, in other words, that, in the five cases specified in s. 1 of the Act, the workman shall not be held to have impliedly contracted to bear those risks. That is the natural and reasonable sense of the language of the statute, and I think we are not compelled to put upon it a meaning which would really destroy what the legislature
- H has intended, and would, in point of fact, so far from helping a workman, take from him some of those benefits which the legislature intended to confer upon him. I agree, therefore, with FIELD, J., in thinking that the judgment should be entered for the defendant in this case.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., and Lindley, L.J.), December 2, 3, 1884]

Solicitor—Charging order—Priority as against garnishee—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict., c. 127), s. 28.

By s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860 [now Solicitors Act, 1957, s. 72], a solicitor who had been employed in any court proceedings might obtain a declaration from the court or judge before whom the proceeding had been heard that he should be entitled to "a charge upon the property recovered or preserved" through his instrumentality "for the taxed costs, charges and expenses of" the proceedings, and "all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right. . . ."

A solicitor acted on behalf of a successful plaintiff in certain proceedings, and in due course the defendant paid the amount of the debt and the balance of the taxed costs to the sheriff. Before the money was paid over a garnishee summons was served on the sheriff by a judgment creditor of the plaintiff. Subsequently the solicitor obtained an order under s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, charging the fund in the sheriff's hands with the balance of the taxed costs remaining due to him.

Held: the garnishee was not "a bona fide purchaser for value without notice," and, therefore, under s. 28, the solicitor was entitled to priority.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (POLLOCK, B., and LOPES, J.), in an action brought by a garnishee to set aside a charging order made by DENMAN, J., in favour of a solicitor, one Adams.

- C In an action Dallow v. Garrold the plaintiff recovered £10 8s. 11d., the amount by which the sum found to be due to the plaintiff on his claim exceeded the amount found to be due to the defendant on his counterclaim. There was a balance of £97 19s. 3d. due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of costs. These sums were paid to the sheriff on April 7, 1884, together with £2 2s. interest and £1 6s. costs of execution.

- D On April 8, 1884, a creditor named Davies, who had obtained a county court judgment against the plaintiff for £8 8s. 10d., caused a garnishee summons from the county court, returnable on May 27, attaching all debts due to the plaintiff to answer the county court judgment, to be served on the sheriff. On April 18, 1884, notice of the receipt of the money by the sheriff, and of the service of the garnishee summons, was given by the sheriff to the plaintiff's solicitor. On May 3,

- E 1884, the sheriff paid to the plaintiff's agent £101 7s. 3d. out of the sum which he had received under the execution, retaining the balance of £10 8s. 11d. On May 14, 1884, Mr. Adams, the solicitor who had acted for the plaintiff in the action of Dallow v. Garrold, gave notice to the sheriff that he claimed a charge on the sum retained in respect of the balance of taxed costs due to him, which amounted to £58 12s. 8d. On June 11, 1884, Mr. Adams made an application to

- F DENMAN, J., and obtained an order under the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, charging the fund recovered by the plaintiff with the costs due to Mr. Adams. On June 24, 1884, the garnishee summons (which had been adjourned) came on for hearing before the judge of the county court. The charging order was produced, and the judge declined to make any order on the summons, but directed the sheriff to retain the money in his hands for twenty-eight days in order that the garnishee might G have time to apply to set aside the charging order. A. L. SMITH, J., at chambers set aside the charging order, but his order was reversed by the Divisional Court.

By the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28 :

- H "In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made, such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon and against and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been
 I recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter, or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of, and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper, and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right: Provided always, that no such order shall be made by any such court or judge in any case in which the right to recover payment of such costs, charges, and expenses is barred by any statute of limitations."

W. E. Hume Williams (A. T. Lawrence with him) for the garnishee.
Hollams for the solicitor.

SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R.—In this case a solicitor acting on behalf of the plaintiff in the action has obtained judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for the amount of the debt and costs. The costs in such a case are certainly something which is recovered, and I am of opinion that they are "property recovered" within the meaning of the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28. The amount of the debt and costs was originally in the hands of the judgment debtor, and afterwards came into the hands of the sheriff. While this money was in the hands of the sheriff a garnishee summons was served on the sheriff by a judgment creditor of the plaintiff. A charging order was afterwards obtained by the solicitor who had acted for the plaintiff in the action. The question to be decided is, whether the solicitor is entitled to have the proceeds of the judgment paid over to him, or whether the garnishee is entitled to priority.

This turns on the construction of s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. Here there is no conveyance within the meaning of that section, but there is an "act done," namely, the application for the garnishee order, which will "operate to defeat" the "charge or right" of the solicitor, if it is held entitled to priority. Here there was a case depending before the court; by the statute "the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending" can make a charging order, and these words, "the court or judge," in a statute or rule of court, unless there is something to show a contrary intention, are always taken to include a judge sitting at chambers. Therefore, by these words DENMAN, J., had jurisdiction, and the proper person to make the charging order made it.

Then the question is whether the solicitor's charge is to be defeated by a garnishee order in favour of a judgment creditor of the plaintiff. Is a person who obtains a garnishee order within the meaning of these words in Act, "unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice." The argument on behalf of the garnishee is, that any person whose claim is bona fide is protected by these words, but the words mean a person who has purchased for value, and a person who has obtained a garnishee order has not done that, and, therefore, is not within the exception. I am, therefore, of opinion that, if we decide the case on the construction of the statute alone, the solicitor is entitled to priority. Moreover, I cannot distinguish the facts of the present case from those of Shippey v. Grey (1), and the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case was founded on the previous decision, also of the Court of Appeal, in Faithfull v. Ewen (2), to the same effect. Therefore, there are two decisions of the Court of Appeal, which are binding on us, and there is also a long string of decisions in the Admiralty, Common Law, and Chancery Courts. Counsel has argued ably on behalf of the garnishee, but the weak point of the argument is, that he has been driven to trying to distinguish the present case from the authorities referred to by taking separate sentences out of the judgments of different judges, instead of dealing with the facts of the cases.

For these reasons I am of opinion, both on principle and authority, that we ought to decide against the appeal. In delivering judgment in the court below, POLLOCK, B., made use of the following expressions :

"It seems to me that the intention must have been to give the solicitor something beyond the lien that existed before in his favour upon funds which might be in his custody, and to enable an order to be made charging any property recovered through his instrumentality. That being so, the question is, whether that charging order is to be dealt with as if it were a mere voluntary charge given by the party entitled in favour of another, or whether it is to be looked upon as intended to give the solicitor priority over all persons whatsoever

A claiming any interest in the fund, so long as the fund remains under the control of the court. It seems to me that the latter is the effect intended by the Act."

I think this is the proper result of all the previous cases.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court ought to be affirmed. Mr. Davies wants to attach the money in the hands of the sheriff; that money is the proceeds of the action brought by Dallow against Garrold, and he knows this; he is not a purchaser, and he cannot say he had no notice that it was probable that the solicitor who acted for the plaintiff in that action would apply for a charging order; but he says that because he is first his garnishee summons is to defeat the solicitor's claim. I am of opinion that this contention is contrary to the terms of the Act. The Act comes to this, that a solicitor has an inchoate right to obtain a charging order, which right cannot be defeated by a claim made by any person who has notice. It has been so held in all the cases which have been decided on this section, among which I may refer to the decision of LORD ROMILLY in Haymes v. Cooper (3). There are also the two decisions of the Court of Appeal, which have been already referred to, and a number of cases in Admiralty, Common Law, and Chancery Courts, all to the same effect.

Appeal dismissed.

Shipping—Salvage—Salvors owners of assisted vessel—Right of shipowners to recover salvage from cargo owners—Salvage rights of master and crew unaffected—Right of cargo owners to counterclaim from salvors.

Shipping—Seaworthiness—Absolute warranty—Latent defect in main shaft—Impossibility of detecting flaw—Liability of shipowners.

A steam screw-ship carrying cargo under a bill of lading containing exceptions against loss or damage from machinery and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation, of whatever nature or kind, became disabled through her main shaft breaking in consequence of a latent defect which was in existence prior to the sailing of the vessel but could not have been detected. Another vessel belonging to the same owners rendered salvage assistance.

Held: (i) the warranty of seaworthiness in the bill of lading was absolute, and, although it was impossible for the shipowners to have discovered the flaw in the shaft the defect rendered the vessel not reasonably fit for the voyage and, therefore, the vessel was unseaworthy; (ii) the exceptions in the bill of lading had no application in the case of a ship which was unseaworthy at the time of sailing and the unseaworthiness was the efficient cause of the loss or damage; (iii) to avoid circuity of action the shipowners, as the owners of both vessels, were precluded from recovering salvage from the cargo owners; (iv) salvage awarded to the crew of the salving vessel could be claimed from the shipowners by the cargo owners by way of counterclaim.

Action by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Glenavon, against the owners of the cargo laden on board the steamship Glenfruin, for salvage services rendered thereto.

The Glenavon was an iron screw-steamship of 2,985 tons gross register, with engines working up to 2,650 horse-power, and was manned by a crew of sixty-six hands. At the time the salvage services were rendered she was on a voyage from Japan and China to New York laden with a cargo of tea. The Glenfruin was at the time the services were rendered on a voyage from Hankow to London, laden with a cargo of tea. The value of the Glenfruin and her freight was £70,000, and of her cargo £158,000. Sixty-two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenavon and sixty-two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenfruin were owned by the same nineteen persons. The remaining two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenavon were held by a Mr. William Houston, and the remaining two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenfruin by another gentleman.

On June 18, 1884, the Glenfruin had broken her main shaft, and on June 26, at about noon, she being then in the Indian Ocean about 2°22' N. lat. and 68°39' E.

- A long., she was observed by those on board the Glenavon flying signals for assistance. On the Glenavon coming up with the Glenfruin it was discovered that the breakdown of the Glenfruin's machinery was due to a fracture in the screw-shaft. After the breakdown, efforts had been made to repair the shaft, and an engineer from the Glenavon went on board the Glenfruin to render assistance. On the morning of June 27 the Glenavon began to tow the Glenfruin, and continued so doing until July 2, when the repairs to the shaft of the Glenfruin were completed and her engines set ahead. It being uncertain whether the repairs would hold, it was agreed that the Glenavon should stay by the Glenfruin until she had passed Cape Guardafui. On July 4 Guardafui was passed, and at noon on July 5, as the Glenfruin's engines continued to work well, and Aden was only 350 miles distant, the Glenavon parted company and proceeded on her voyage. The Glenfruin eventually reached London in safety. The towage extended over about 900 miles, and the weather was fine during the rendering of the services. By way of defence the defendants alleged that the action of the plaintiffs as owners of the Glenavon in assisting the Glenfruin was done only in fulfilment of the contracts contained in the bills of lading and that the cargo was laden on board the Glenfruin under the contracts on terms that the vessel should be seaworthy for the voyage and the vessel was not seaworthy in that the screw-shaft was defective, unsound and in improper condition. The defendants further counterclaimed for any remuneration awarded to the plaintiffs or to the master or crew of the Glenavon or any of them. In their reply the plaintiffs denied that their action in towing the Glenfruin was in fulfilment of the contracts and that the Glenfruin had put to sea in an unseaworthy condition. They further alleged that the breaking of the shaft was within the terms of the following exception in the bills of lading:

F "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers by land or sea; restraint of princes, rulers, or people, loss or damage from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from explosion, heat, or fire on board, in hulk, or craft, or on shore; jettison, barratry, misfeasance, error in judgment; any act or neglect or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, in the management or navigation, of the ship; risks of craft, or hulk, or transhipment, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and canal, and of navigation, of whatsoever nature or kind, are excepted."

G At the hearing of the action evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs as to the nature of the salvage services. It was also proved that the screw-shaft had been bought from a first-class firm, that the flaw was due to a latent defect which it would have been impossible to discover, and that the owners of the Glenfruin had used all reasonable diligence in the selection of the shaft.

Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Bucknill for the plaintiffs.

Webster, Q.C., Tyser and Barnes for the defendants.

- H Mar. 31, 1885. BUTT, J., stated the facts and continued: The principal questions raised and discussed in the case were: (i) Was the breakdown of the Glenfruin's shaft caused by unseaworthiness? (ii) Does the implied warranty of seaworthiness in the bill of lading amount to a contract by the shipowners that the ship (including her machinery) shall be in fact reasonably fit for the voyage, or only that due care shall be taken to make her so fit? (iii) Was the warranty qualified, I or were the shipowners otherwise exempted from liability for the breaking of the shaft by the exceptions in the bill of lading?

With reference to the first of these questions, it appears from the evidence that very few, if any, of these large shafts are turned out, even by the best makers, without some flaws in the welding. If one of such flaws is of a serious nature, it is apt to extend from the strain put upon it by the working of the engines, and in course of time so to weaken the shaft as to make it unfit for the purposes for which it is designed. This is almost always, if not always, the cause of the breaking of the shafts of large steamers. The shaft in question had been made by one of the best firms, and after its completion it was impossible for that firm, or for the owners of the ship, to discover the flaw until it was laid bare by the breaking of the shaft. That flaw was a very serious one. It had no doubt increased gradually during the four years the shaft was in use, and the defect culminated in the breakdown on a voyage on which the ship had met with no more than ordinary weather. I find as a fact that, when the Glenfruin started from Hankow, the shaft was not reasonably fit for the voyage; in other words, that the ship was unseaworthy. A B

On the second question, viz., that relating to the nature and extent of the warranty of seaworthiness, I am, I think, concluded by authority. I have always understood the result of the cases from Lyon v. Mells (1) to Kopitoff v. Wilson (2) to be, that under his implied warranty of seaworthiness the shipowner contracts, not merely that he will do his best to make the ship reasonably fit, but that she shall really be reasonably fit for the voyage. Had those cases left any doubt in my mind it would have been set at rest by the observations of some of the Peers in the opinions they delivered in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (3). C

Thirdly, I am of opinion that the exceptions in the bill of lading have not the effect either of limiting the implied warranty or of otherwise exempting the shipowner from liability to the owners of cargo for damage or loss occasioned by the breaking of the shaft. It appears to me that the reasonable construction of the exceptions relied on by the plaintiffs, viz., "all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and canal, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind"—must be "dangers and accidents" happening to a seaworthy vessel, and that the exception has no application to the case of a ship which was unseaworthy at the time of sailing, and the unseaworthiness of which was the efficient cause of the loss or damage. In Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (3), to which I have already referred, the decision of the House of Lords was that the exceptions contained in the bill of lading then under consideration were exceptions of matters subsequent to the sailing of the ship with the goods on board. I can see no reason for taking a different view of the exceptions in the bill of lading in the present case. The result is, that the part owners of the Glenavon, who were also part owners of the Glenfruin, would be liable to the owners of cargo on board the Glenfruin for any loss occasioned by the breakdown of the machinery. In other words, such part owners (plaintiffs in the present suit) would be liable to reimburse the defendants any amount of salvage that I might award. To avoid what is termed "circuity of action," I must decline to make any award in favour of those plaintiffs. D E F

There is, however, one of the plaintiffs (Mr. William Houston, the owner of two sixty-fourth shares of the Glenavon) who is not a part owner of the Glenfruin, and who would, therefore, be entitled to his proportion of the salvage that would have been awarded to the plaintiffs had none of them been part owners of the Glenfruin. Again, I do not understand it to have been contended, either in the pleadings or in the argument, that the master and crew of the Glenavon are not entitled to salvage remuneration. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and bearing in mind that the two ships for practical purposes must be taken to have belonged to the same owners, and that the cargo only of the Glenfruin, and not ship, freight, and cargo, are proceeded against in this action, I award £40 to the plaintiff William Houston, £50 to the master, and £250 to the officers and crew of the Glenavon, according to their respective ratings. There will also be judgment for the defendants on their counterclaim against the owners of the Glenfruin for the amount of salvage I have awarded. G H. I

Appeal from a decision of WATKIN WILLIAMS, J., at chambers, reversing the decision of Master WALTON, who had ordered the defendant to make further and better answers to certain interrogatories which had been delivered to him by the plaintiff.

The action was one for libel which charged the defendant with writing and publishing certain defamatory statements contained in two placards. The statement of defence denied the publication, and pleaded justification. The plaintiff administered interrogatories to the defendant relating to the writing and publication of the said placards. To these interrogatories the defendant made the following answer:

I

"In answer to the said interrogatories, I, the above-named Henry Munster, make oath, and say as follows: I decline to answer all the said interrogatories, upon the ground that my answers to them might tend to criminate."

Gore for the plaintiff.

Woollett (Prankerd with him) for the defendant.

FIELD, J.—We have come to the conclusion that the decision of WATKIN WILLIAMS, J., is right, and are of opinion that this answer is in substance sufficient. This is an important point, no doubt; and whether it be right or not, the principle of the law of this country is that a man shall not be compelled to say anything on oath to criminate himself. The expression “criminating himself” may have various meanings; and I think it may mean, that the person making the statement will be brought within the pains and penalties of a criminal trial; and no man is bound to bring himself within them. How is that objection to be raised? At the trial, when the witness is in the witness-box, he is asked a certain question which he refuses to answer because of its known tendency to criminate him. Counsel for the plaintiff says that is not enough, but that the witness must answer more; he must state that, in his opinion, to answer the question would tend to criminate him. This would practically be to refer the witness to a professional lawyer to ask his opinion of the tendency of the question. The question now, in my opinion, comes in the province of the judge. The judge can look at the question itself; having regard to the surrounding circumstances, and irrespectively of the possible answer of the witness, he should look to the nature of the answer for the purpose of seeing whether it would have a tendency to criminate the witness interrogated. Though adverse to giving too favourable a construction to this principle of law, I should hesitate to compel a man to answer a question which might tend to criminate him.

What is the present case? These are clearly questions tending to criminate the defendant. He is charged with a libel for which he could be indicted. Having got his answer to these interrogatories, the plaintiff might go before a grand jury at Lewes and prefer a bill of indictment against the defendant. They would also tend to substantiate the plaintiff’s first ground of action, viz., the publication of the libel. If the answers to these interrogatories will tend to criminate the defendant he need not answer them. It is said that it is not enough for the defendant to swear on oath that the answer would tend to criminate him, but that he believes it would tend to criminate him. I do not find any authorities on which counsel for the plaintiff can rest his application. It has been thought to be a mistake to compel a man to decline to answer a question tending to criminate him on the common-sense ground that the refusal to answer in the presence of the jury would be a proof to them of the truth of the question. However, it is the law. I find that as a matter of fact the different judges in the different cases use different words as to what will be a sufficient answer. I am of opinion there is no substance in this application, that the answer is sufficient, and that the order should be affirmed.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion, but would like to add a few words to the effect that I agree with my learned brother in this matter. In every case one ought to consider the main principle of law on this point, but it would be a very great pity to lay down any strict rule as to the particular form of words in which persons are to express their opinion that an answer would criminate them. I think, when the matter is fully examined into, it is intended that there shall be a personal protection against any man being compelled to answer any question tending to criminate him.

“No one is bound to answer any question if the answer thereto would, in the opinion of the judge, have a tendency to expose the witness . . . to any criminal charge, or to any penalty or forfeiture which the judge regards as reasonably likely to be preferred or sued for.”

This passage from my own book (STEPHEN’S DIGEST OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE (3rd Edn.), p. 121) illustrates what I understand by the expression “criminating oneself.” I do not think the privilege is so narrowly restricted as counsel for the plaintiff contends it is.

In my opinion the proper extent of the principle is as follows. If I am aware that a person is going to bring a criminal charge against me, or I reasonably think

A a criminal charge is going to be brought against me, I can say: "I shall hold my tongue; prove your case yourself, and not out of my mouth." The court who has to decide the question must be certified on the oath of the witness that he objects on the ground that the answer to the question will tend to criminate him.

In the well-known case of R. v. Boyes (1) COCKBURN, C.J., said (1 B. & S. at pp. 329, 330):

B "It was also contended that a bare possibility of legal peril was sufficient to entitle a witness to protection; nay, further, that the witness was the sole judge as to whether his evidence would bring him into danger of the law, and that the statement of his belief to that effect, if not manifestly made mala fide, should be received as conclusive. With the latter of these propositions we are altogether unable to concur. Upon a review of the authorities we are clearly
C of opinion that . . . to entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer."

D In this case the defendant is asked if he published these libels. The answer in the affirmative would tend to criminate him. I cannot say an indictment for libel in this case is an imaginary danger which might befall the defendant. I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (KAY, J.), July 18, 23, 1883]

[Reported 24 Ch.D. 637; 52 L.J.Ch. 793; 49 L.T. 163; 32 W.R. 30]

G Conflict of Laws—Legitimacy—Legitimacy of child according to law of father's domicile—Will—Bequest of personalty for "great-nephews, sons of deceased nephew"—Nephew domiciled in Guernsey—Child born before marriage—Legitimation under Guernsey law per subsequens matrimonium—Right of child to share in bequest.

H A testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees in trust for his great-nephews, the sons of his deceased nephew, T.G.A., in equal shares. T.G.A. was a native of Guernsey. The plaintiff was a son of T.G.A., born before the marriage of his parents, who were domiciled in Guernsey both at the time of the plaintiff's birth and of their subsequent marriage. By the law of Guernsey children born out of wedlock became legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents. Other children were born after the marriage; and the plaintiff claimed to share with them in the property bequeathed by
I the will.

Held: a bequest of personalty in an English will to the children of a foreigner meant to his legitimate children; by international law, as recognised in this country, those children were legitimate whose legitimacy was fixed by the law of the father's domicile; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to share in the gift as a legitimate child of his father.

Per KAY, J.: It must now be treated as settled that any person, legitimate according to the law of the domicile of his father at his birth, is legitimate everywhere within the range of international law, for the purpose of succeeding to personal property. A Special Case stated, by consent, for the opinion of the court, pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 34.

William Andros, who died on Jan. 23, 1882, by his will, dated Aug. 13, 1879, gave one-third of his residuary personal estate to his trustees, Amias Charles Andros and Edwyn Brenton Andros, upon trust to pay and divide the same between such of his great-nephews, the sons of his deceased nephew, Thomas Godfrey Andros, as should survive him and should attain the age of twenty-five years, in equal shares; but he gave to his trustees absolute discretion to pay to his great-nephews, or either of them, the whole or any portion of the capital of the shares or share to which they or he might be presumptively entitled, at any time his trustees might consider it expedient so to do. And the testator declared that his great-nephews should, on attaining the age of twenty-one years, be entitled to receive the income of the share or shares to which they, or either of them, should then be presumptively entitled. The plaintiff, Thomas Godfrey Andros, was the son of the testator's nephew, Thomas Godfrey Andros, and of Sarah Emma Andros, formerly Sarah Emma Forbes, spinster. The plaintiff was born in the island of Guernsey on Dec. 1, 1860. The testator's nephew (the plaintiff's father) was born in Guernsey, and was domiciled there at the date of the plaintiff's birth. The plaintiff's mother was also domiciled in Guernsey at that date. The testator's nephew was not married to Sarah Emma Forbes at the time when the plaintiff was born, but, subsequently to the plaintiff's birth, viz., on Jan. 21, 1865, he duly intermarried with her. G H I

According to the law of Guernsey a child born before the marriage of its parents becomes legitimate on, and by reason of, his parents' subsequent marriage, and for the purposes of succession to personal property, and for all other purposes, is deemed to be a legitimate child of its father and mother as fully as if it had been

A born in lawful wedlock. The plaintiff, therefore, according to the law of Guernsey, became legitimate on Jan. 21, 1865, and from that date was, according to that law, entitled to be deemed a legitimate child of the testator's nephew. After the testator's nephew had married he had four more children, such four children being defendants, and all under the age of twenty-one years.

B The testator's nephew lived in Guernsey during the greater part of his life, and died there on Nov. 12, 1875. He was domiciled in Guernsey when he died.

C The defendants, Amias Charles Andros and Edwyn Brenton Andros, as trustees of the testator's will, had in their possession securities on which they had duly invested one-third part of the testator's residuary personal estate, upon the trusts declared in favour of the testator's great-nephews. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to a share of such third part of the testator's residuary personal estate, and after attaining the age of twenty-one years he applied to the trustees to pay the same to him. The trustees were, however, advised that they could not safely do so until the court had expressed its opinion that the plaintiff ought to be deemed a legitimate great-nephew of the testator.

D The following questions were accordingly submitted for the opinion of the court: Whether the plaintiff ought, under the circumstances, to be deemed a legitimate son of the testator's nephew, Thomas Godfrey Andros, for the purposes of the testator's will, and as such entitled to a share of one equal third part of the testator's residuary personal estate; and whether the trustees were at liberty to pay to the plaintiff his proper share of such one-third part.

Cur. adv. vult.

F July 23, 1883. KAY, J.—The Special Case states the will of an English testator bequeathing personal property to the testator's great-nephews, the sons of his deceased nephew, Thomas Godfrey Andros. The plaintiff is a son of T. G. Andros, who intermarried with the plaintiff's mother after his birth, and by the law of Guernsey, of which island the father was a native, and where he and the mother were domiciled both at the time of the plaintiff's birth and their subsequent marriage, the plaintiff became legitimate when the marriage took place. Other children were born after the marriage. The will, being an English will, must of course be construed according to English law. That law requires that all who take under a gift to sons of a named father should be legitimate offspring.

G It must now be treated as settled that any person, legitimate according to the law of the domicile of his father at his birth, is legitimate everywhere within the range of international law, for the purpose of succeeding to personal property. The well-known case of Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1), which introduced a distinction in this respect in the case of a person claiming to succeed as heir to real property in England, by requiring such a person to establish his legitimacy according to English law—that is, as though the father had been domiciled in England at the time of the birth of the child—treats this as an exceptional case, and recognises that the rule of succession to personal estate is otherwise; and this has been recently more expressly decided by the Court of Appeal in Re Goodman's Trusts (2). If, then, a child of a foreigner, legitimate according to the law of his father's domicile, though illegitimate if his father had been an Englishman, can succeed as next-of-kin to personal estate in England, why should he not take a bequest of personalty by the description of the son of his father in the will of an English testator? On principle, it seems to me very difficult to see why he should not.

I However, in Boyes v. Bedale (3) LORD HATHERLEY, in a considered judgment, decided that such a person could not take under a gift to the children of his father. The will, and every term in it, his Lordship held, must be construed according to English law. If, he said, in a Canadian will there were a gift of £100, that would mean £100 Canadian currency, not £100 sterling; so that the testator “must be taken to mean a child in the sense in which the law of England understands the term." Speaking with all deference, the illustration seems to me to be inapt and wanting in analogy. If two countries happen to have the same name for their monetary currency, no one for a moment could suppose that a testator in one of them, using the familiar name of the currency of his own country, meant by that the currency of different value of the foreign country which happened to have the same name; but how does it follow from this that a gift to the children of a foreigner means such children only as would be legitimate if he had been a domiciled Englishman? A bequest in an English will to the children of A. means to the legitimate children, but the rule of construction goes no further. The question remains, who are the legitimate children? That certainly is not a question of construction of the will; it is a question of status. By what law is that status to be determined? That is the question of law. Does that comity of nations, which we call international law, apply to the case or not? That may be a matter for consideration, but I do not see how the construction of the will has anything to do with it.

The matter may be put in another way. What did the testator intend by this gift? That is answered by the rule of construction. He intended A.'s legitimate children. If you ask the further question, did he intend his children who would be legitimate according to English law, or his actual legitimate children? How can the rule of construction answer that? LORD HATHERLEY considered that the bequest must be read, to such children as would be legitimate, according to the law of England, if their father had been a domiciled Englishman at their birth. But is that according to the English rule of construction, that "children" means "legitimate children?" Try it thus: Suppose the same rule of construction to prevail in Guernsey, and that in the will of a Guernsey testator there were a bequest to the children of an Englishman. According to Boyes v. Bedale (3) children would mean such children as would be legitimate according to the law of Guernsey. By this construction ante nati of the English father would share with his children legitimate according to English law, because they would have been legitimate if the father had been domiciled in Guernsey, though they were in fact illegitimate by English law, and of course by international law. This would not carry out, but contravene, the rule of construction.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Re Wilson's Trusts, Ex parte Shaw (4), expressed his readiness to follow Boyes v. Bedale (3). The facts of that case, however, were not the same. A domiciled Englishman had married an English woman. He went to Scotland, and, without having a Scottish domicile, he sued for and obtained a Scottish divorce, which was not sufficient to dissolve the English marriage. The woman married in Scotland a domiciled Scotsman, and had children by him, and the question was whether they could be considered legitimate in England. The decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., was supported in the House of Lords (Shaw v. Gould (4)) on the ground that international law did not require the English courts to recognise such a divorce, and therefore the children were not by that law legitimate. That decision does not apply, because it cannot be denied that the children in this case would be recognised as legitimate, for some purposes at any rate, by every other state in Christendom. These are the two cases most nearly in point on the one side.

On the other hand, there are two decisions of STUART, V.-C., viz., Goodman v. Goodman (5) and Skottowe v. Young (6). SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., observed of the former that the point was not there really considered and decided: see Re Goodman's Trusts (2). But, according to the reports it certainly was argued, and the decision was, that ante nati born in England while the father was domiciled here, could not take under a gift to them, but that an ante natus born in Holland when the father was domiciled there might take in conjunction with the post nati by the same mother when he married in that country, thus legitimating the ante nati there. Skottowe v. Young (6) was a question of legacy duty, but the same point was involved. Besides these two cases there is the analogy, which I have referred to, derivable from the decisions showing that a child, legitimate by the

A law of his father's domicile, may take as next-of-kin in a succession to personal estate in England.

But, in addition to these considerations, there is the opinion of COTTON and JAMES, L.JJ., in Re Goodman's Trusts (2). The former says (17 Ch.D. at p. 295):

B "In Boyes v. Bedale (3) the question was on the construction of a bequest in the will of a domiciled Englishman to the children of a person named. The Vice-Chancellor held that a child exactly in the same position as Hannah Pieret was not entitled under the bequest. He said that the will, being that of a domiciled Englishman, must be construed according to English law, which, in my opinion, is correct so far as to require that this word 'children' shall be construed 'legitimate children.' But he held that English law recognised as legitimate only those children born in wedlock. This, though correct as regards C the children of persons domiciled in England at the time of their birth, is, in my opinion, erroneous as to children born of parents who, at the time of their birth, were domiciled in a country by the law of which the children were legitimate."

JAMES, L.J., says (ibid. at pp. 299, 300) the decision in Boyes v. Bedale (3)

D "was on the ground that, in an Englishman's will, the child of a nephew must mean children who would be lawful children if they were English children. That seems to me a violent presumption. It was an accident in that case that the testator was an Englishman. But supposing it had been the will of a Frenchman, dying domiciled in England, and made in favour of his French relations and their children, or of his own children, there being children legitimate and legitimated, what would have been said of such a presumption and E such a construction?"

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Goodman's Trusts (2) overruled SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and was dissented from by LUSH, L.J.

This conflict of authority leaves me free to decide this case according to my own opinion, which is in favour of the plaintiff's claim. I observe that the testator F describes the objects of his bounty, not merely as the sons of his deceased nephew Thomas Godfrey Andros, but also as his own great-nephews; but that, in my opinion, makes no difference. The law of this country, by the comity of nations, recognises the plaintiff as legitimate; and therefore he is as much the lawful nephew of the testator as he is the lawful son of T. G. Andros. The law, as I G understand it, is that a bequest of personalty in an English will to the children of a foreigner means to his legitimate children, and that, by international law, as recognised in this country, those children are legitimate whose legitimacy is fixed by the law of the father's domicile. Thus, ante nati, whose father was domiciled in Guernsey at their birth, and subsequently married the mother, so as to make ante nati legitimate by the law of Guernsey, are recognised as legitimate by the law of this country, and can take under such a gift.

A testator directed his trustees to stand possessed of his residuary personal estate upon trust, by and out of the income thereof, to pay to his wife "the clear yearly sum of £600" for life, if she should remain his widow, but if she should marry again, an annuity of £100 in lieu of the annuity of £600, "the said annuities of £600 and £100, as the case may be, to be paid free from all deductions and abatements whatsoever." A Administration Action in respect of the estate of William Leetham deceased, in which the question arose upon further consideration whether an annuity given by his will to his widow was given free of income tax.

William Leetham, who died on Jan. 14, 1875, by his will, dated Sept. 1, 1864, after appointing executors and trustees, and after giving directions respecting the management and conversion of his estate, declared that his trustees should stand possessed of his residuary personal estate, and of the funds in which the same should be invested, and the income thereof, upon trust, by and out of the said income, to pay to his wife "the clear yearly sum of £600 for life, if she should so long remain his widow, in half-yearly portions, but if she should marry again, then the trustees were to pay her during her life, for her sole and separate use, an annuity of £100 in lieu of the annuity of £600: "the said annuities of £600 and £100, as the case may be, to be paid free from all deductions and abatements whatsoever"; and, subject thereto, he gave and bequeathed his residuary personal estate to the trustees upon certain trusts in favour of his children. By a codicil, dated April 3, 1869, the testator revoked the appointment of one of the executors and trustees appointed by the will, and gave and bequeathed to his wife "an annuity of £1,000 in lieu of the annuity of £600"—given to her by his will. In all other respects he confirmed his will.

This was an action by the sole executor and trustee of the will against the widow (the annuitant named in the will and codicil), and the eldest son of the testator, praying that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution and the real and personal estate of the testator administered by the court. The action now came on upon further consideration, when the question was raised whether the widow was entitled to have the income tax on her annuity of £1,000 paid out of the residuary personal estate of the testator, or ought to pay it herself.

KAY, J.—There are two classes of cases in reference to this question. One, where by will a testator gives an annuity, and then directs that it shall be free from all deductions in respect of any taxes, and of this class of cases the principal examples are Festing v. Taylor (1), a decision of the Exchequer Chamber; Lord Lovat v. Duchess of Leeds (No. 1) (2), and Re Bannerman's Estate, Bannerman v. Young (3). In all these cases, the word "deduction" was construed by the "taxes" which was associated with it, and it seems to have been held that the annuity was to be paid free of income tax.

The other class of cases are those in which the words are "to be paid without any deduction," or "free from legacy duty and other deductions," and in those cases the income tax was held to be payable by the annuitants, because income tax, as it seems to have been stated over and over again, is not, properly speaking, a deduction, and there must be something else besides the word "deduction" to make the gift of an annuity free of income tax. It was only where the word "deduction" was coupled with the word "taxes," or there was some other indication that it was meant to include income tax, that it was so construed. Of this second class of cases the principal examples are Lethbridge v. Thurlow (4), Abadam v. Abadam (5), and Sadler v. Rickards (6).

In Turner v. Mullineux (7), the gift was in this way; a demise by the testator to trustees upon trust, out of the rents and profits, to pay his widow during widowhood an annuity of £350, "free from income or property tax, or any other deduction," and after a declaration that it was to be in full of all claims for dower, there was a further trust out of the rents and profits "to pay to each of the testator's daughters an annuity of £100 apiece," to be paid "free from all deductions," and after the second marriage of the widow, which had happened, to pay to one of the daughters "the further annuity of £150 free from deduction." A

It was the last words which had to be construed, and Wood, V.-C., said (1 John. & H. at p. 835):

"This court always holds that income tax is not a deduction; but here the testator in the first instance speaks of 'income or property tax and all other deductions,' which explains that he understood the word 'deduction' as extend- B ing to income tax. When he afterwards goes on to give other annuities, he shortens his form of expression to, in the last gift, 'free from deduction.'
The true way of construing the will is, not to interpret the last gift and carry back that construction of the word 'deduction' to the earlier clauses, but to read the word throughout in the sense in which it is first used."

In other words, the testator by his will put on the word "deduction" a meaning which evidently showed that he intended it to include income tax, and accordingly C it was held that it was included in the subsequent words, "free from all deductions," and "free from deductions."

One other case on this point I desire to refer to specially, that of Sadler v.
Rickards (6), where the words of gift, which was by will, were upon trust to invest the proceeds as therein mentioned, and the trustees were, out of the income arising D from the investments, to pay the annual sum of £500 "free from legacy duty and other deductions," to the testator's wife during her life, and, subject thereto, to apply the income for the benefit of his children, and Wood, V.-C., said (4 K. & J. at p. 804):

"Without going into the question how I should have decided the point in the absence of those authorities [Wall v. Wall (8), and Lethbridge v. Thurlow (4)] E
I must hold that this annuity is subject to income tax under the recent Act [Income Tax Act, 1853] and the tax must be paid out of the annuity itself."

In the present case the words are not quite like those I have read in the two cases from which I have quoted. The question is, within which of the two classes of cases the gift in this case comes. It is to be "the clear yearly sum" . . . "free from all deductions and abatements whatsoever." I may observe that there is no use of F the word "tax," or anything of the kind. It is contended that this case is distinguishable from the latter class of cases, for the reason that the annuity was given by the testator to his wife,—“to pay to his wife the clear yearly sum of.”
If, however, income tax be not a deduction, but a payment which she has to make herself, not out of the annuity, but because she receives the annuity, I do not consider that the word "clear" carries the matter any further. If it be not a G deduction, then the annuity is paid to her clear of any deduction. I do not think that it is well for judges to make fine distinctions of this kind. It is much better and more beneficial to the world in general that the broad line of demarcation should be adhered to and not departed from. It seems to me that this case comes within the latter of the two classes of cases to which I have referred, it being a case in which there is no reference to the word "tax," but merely a direction that H the annuity shall be paid free from all deductions and abatements, and of the clear yearly sum mentioned.

I confess that, but for the authorities referred to, I should have felt a little more difficulty than I do, because, the annuity being given by the testator to his wife, I do not see what deduction was aimed at if not the income tax. The widow would not have had to pay legacy duty, therefore the testator could not have I meant that. It is possible to give a meaning to the word "abatements," because, although not likely in this case, the income might not be enough to pay the annuity, and in that case the word "abatements" might mean that it should come out of the capital. But it seems difficult to give a meaning to the word "deductions" when coupled with "abatements," in the case of an annuity to a wife. I cannot help thinking that it is possible, if the testator had been asked what he meant, that he would have said that he intended to refer to income tax, and that it should be paid out of his estate; but without speculating upon what the testator

A might have meant, I must adhere to the rule of construction laid down in the decisions, and consequently I am not at liberty to treat income tax as being a deduction. I, therefore, hold that the widow must pay the income tax—that the annuity was not given free of it.

Mortgage—Consolidation—Mortgage of one property not created until after equity of redemption of other property parted with.

The rule that a mortgagee holding mortgages upon two different estates of the same mortgagor may consolidate them, so that one cannot be redeemed without the other, does not apply to a case in which the mortgage of one property was not created till after the equity of redemption of the other property had been parted with. In such a case the purchaser seeking to redeem is not subject to any equity arising from acts done by his vendor subsequently to the sale, and there is, as against him, no equity to consolidate the two mortgages.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (JAMES, BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.J.J.), reversing a decision of BACON, V.-C., G reported sub nom. Mills v. Jennings, 13 Ch.D. 639.

The action was brought by Mills (since deceased) and the respondent Jordan, trustees of a settlement made in 1838, against the appellant, to redeem a mortgage and further charge on certain property at Cheltenham, created by one Thomas Tale in 1836. The appellant claimed a right to consolidate with the mortgage of 1836 a mortgage on other property created by Thomas Tale in 1839. The respondent Price was added as a defendant as representing the equity of redemption in all the mortgaged property not included in the settlement of 1838.

North, Q.C., and Selfe for the respondent Jordan.

Millar, Q.C., and R. Gaskell for the respondent Price.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 3, 1881. The following opinions were read.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—The action in this case was to redeem a mortgage of copyhold property at Cheltenham, executed on Oct. 6, 1836, to secure £500 and interest to one John Merrett, to which a further charge of £250 and interest was added in the following year. The equity of redemption, not of the whole, but of some cottages which were part of the mortgaged property, was, on Dec. 3, 1838,

A settled by Thomas Tale, the mortgagor, for valuable consideration on the marriage of his daughter, subject, as between himself and the parties interested under the settlement, to the charge of £250 and interest thereon, and with a covenant by him to keep the settled cottages indemnified from the residue of the mortgage debt of £500 and interest. The plaintiffs, of whom the respondent Jordan is the survivor, were the trustees of that settlement. Another mortgage, upon distinct property, B consisting of freehold land at Cheltenham, had been made, in 1834, by the same mortgagor, Thomas Tale, to one Middleton, upon which there was due at the time of the settlement of the cottages, £500 and interest including a further charge made in 1836. On Dec. 16, 1836, the property so mortgaged to Middleton, and the copyhold property other than the cottages included in Merrett's security, were mortgaged by Thomas Tale to John Tale, to secure £500 and further advances, not exceeding altogether £1,000, with interest thereon. At the date of the settlement, C therefore, Merrett's was the only direct charge upon the cottages; but they were not redeemable separately from the rest of the copyhold property mortgaged first to Merrett, and, secondly, to John Tale; and, as against John Tale, the mortgage of that copyhold property was not redeemable separately from the freehold of which he was second mortgagee, and was then entitled to redeem from Middleton. On D Oct. 30, 1839, after the date of the settlement, Thomas Tale mortgaged certain other copyhold property belonging to him in Union Street, Cheltenham, to the same John Tale, to secure £400 and interest. In 1849 John Tale's and Middleton's mortgages became vested, after certain mesne assignments, in the predecessor in title of the appellant Jennings, and, in September, 1857, Merrett's mortgage was also transferred to him.

E At the hearing before BACON, V.-C., the action was dismissed, not upon the merits, but because the Vice-Chancellor thought that the persons properly entitled to redeem the mortgages vested in the appellant Jennings were not all before the court, leave to amend by adding parties having been previously given. On appeal, the lords justices differed from the Vice-Chancellor, and made a decree for redemption of which the appellant Jennings now complains. I postpone the consideration F of the objections to the suit which were urged at your Lordships' Bar, and, in my opinion, ought not to prevail. For the present, I address myself solely to the question whether, assuming all necessary parties to have been before the court, the decree now under appeal is right, or ought in any respect to be varied.

The appellant claimed by his pleadings a right to consolidate against the plaintiffs all his securities, including the mortgage of the property in Union Street, G Cheltenham, originally made to John Tale on Oct. 30, 1839, after the equity of redemption of the cottages had become absolutely vested in the trustees of the marriage settlement of Dec. 3, 1838. The lords justices held that he was entitled to consolidate all the other mortgages which were prior to that settlement, but that this right did not extend to the Union Street mortgage, and they decreed accordingly. Upon this, which was the principal question in the cause, I agree H with the lords justices. A mortgagee, who holds several distinct mortgages under the same mortgagor, redeemable not by express contract, but only by virtue of the right which, in English jurisprudence, is called "equity of redemption," may, within certain limits, and against certain persons entitled to redeem all or some of them, "consolidate" them—that is, treat them as one, and decline to be redeemed as to any unless he is redeemed as to all. This doctrine of consolidation is well I established, and cannot now be altered except by the legislature, whether it originally rested on a sound equitable foundation or not.

The present question is as to its proper limits. There is no difficulty in its application when all the mortgages, whether originally made to the same mortgagee, or having come into a single hand by subsequent assignments, are redeemable at the same time by the same person. Its extension to a case in which, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated by the act of the person in whom they had been combined, though it may perhaps be open to objection on some practical grounds, rests upon an intelligible principle.

The purchaser of an equity of redemption must take it as it stood at the time of his purchase, subject to all other equities which then affected it in the hands of his vendor, of which the right of the mortgagee to consolidate his charge on that particular property with other charges held by him on other property at the same time redeemable under the same mortgagor was one. The mortgagee cannot lose that right because the mortgagor thinks fit to separate the equities of redemption. The two mortgages having already become virtually one, the purchaser of part of the equity of redemption is no more entitled to escape from this position than the present plaintiffs would have been to redeem the cottages only without also redeeming the rest of the copyhold property included in Merrett's mortgage. In the present case the rights of redemption, existing at the date of the settlement of 1838 could not, in my opinion, have been properly worked out, unless by some voluntary arrangement between the parties interested, otherwise than by consolidating all the mortgages now vested in the appellant Jennings, which were prior in their creation to Dec. 3, 1838; as they have been in fact consolidated by the decree of the Court of Appeal.

I have much more difficulty in following, or satisfactorily explaining, the principle of some other authorities, such as Beevor v. Luck (2), which have held, contrary to the decision of ALDERSON, B., in White v. Hillacre (3), that a mortgagee's right to consolidate as against the purchaser of the equity of redemption of property mortgaged to him is capable of being enlarged after the date of that purchase, by a transfer to the mortgagee of other mortgages which were then in other hands, with the equity of redemption of which, if there were no consolidation, the purchaser would have nothing to do. I do not, however, think it necessary or proper now to determine whether this enlargement of the doctrine has been, as some eminent judges have thought, conclusively settled by authority. The explanation of it which has been offered is that at the date of the purchase of the equity of redemption, the doctrine of consolidation was potentially applicable to any two or more mortgages then in existence, and redeemable by the same person, although then in separate hands, if they should afterwards come together.

I cannot say that this commends itself to my mind as reasonable or equitable; but the contention of the appellant in the present case goes much further. He seeks to consolidate with securities, which were in existence on Dec. 3, 1838, a mortgage of later date on property not included in any of those securities. It is against all principle that a vendor should be enabled, after parting with his whole interest in particular property, to impose an additional burden upon it without the purchaser's consent—not by any express contract which might, in some cases, prevail if protected by a legal estate without notice, but indirectly, and without any contract at all. For my own part I cannot conceive anything more inequitable; and there is no authority for it, unless it be Tassell v. Smith (1). If that case is distinguishable upon its particular circumstances, it is no authority for that proposition. If not so distinguishable, it is inconsistent with the decision of HALL, V.-C., in Baker v. Gray (4), and of the lords justices in the case now before your Lordships. The observations of LORD HARDWICKE in Titley v. Davies (5), are, as it seems to me, in accordance with sound principle, and with the decisions of HALL, V.-C., and of the lords justices in the present case. I cannot, therefore, regard Tassell v. Smith (1) as an authority which ought to be followed on this occasion, great as was the eminence of the judges who decided it.

The decree, therefore, of the Court of Appeal was, in my opinion, right in refusing the consolidation claimed by the appellant, so far as relates to the Union Street mortgage. In consolidating the other mortgages held by the appellant it gave effect to a claim which he had made by his pleadings which was never disputed by the plaintiffs. The appellant's counsel did not retract that claim either before or after the judgment of the Court of Appeal; but when the decree had been drawn up, passed, and entered, it seems for the first time to have occurred to him that unless he could consolidate all, it was not for his interest to consolidate, as against the plaintiffs, any of his securities, the Union Street mortgage being, as he now

A suggests (though it does not appear by any evidence in the cause), the only one of his securities which is deficient, and the account being directed against him as mortgagee in possession, which he and his predecessors in title have for many years been.

Something was said at the Bar about the possibility of his being able to set up the Statute of Limitations against the respondent Price, who represents the equity of redemption in all the mortgaged property, except the cottages of which the respondent Jordan is trustee; and it was insisted that the effect of the decree is to deprive him of the right, which he would have had otherwise, to consolidate the Union Street mortgage, if still redeemable by Price, with the other securities as against Price, though he could not do so as against Jordan. To avoid these apprehended results of the decision against him, the appellant, on May 29, 1880, after C of the decree had been formally completed, gave notice of a motion before the Court of Appeal to "correct" that decree by omitting the declaration contained in it that he was entitled to consolidate his other securities, prior to the settlement of Dec. 3, 1838, with the mortgage and further charge originally made to Merrett, and by limiting the consequential directions to an account, first of what was due to him for principal and interest, not generally on Merrett's securities, but only in D respect of the £250 and interest, which was to be borne, under the terms of the settlement of Dec. 3, 1838, by the settled cottages, as between the settlement and Thomas Tale; and, secondly, of the rents and profits of the settled cottages only, which the appellant or his predecessors in title, had, or might have, without his or their wilful default, received. This motion was properly refused by the lords justices on the ground that what was sought was not a correction or alteration of any E slip in the decree, but a substantial change in it not asked for at the hearing, and contrary to what was then intended and understood by the court and all the parties.

The present appeal is not only against the decree made on Feb. 14, 1880, but is also against the order refusing that motion made on June 5, 1880; and it has been contended at your Lordships' Bar that the decree ought to have left it open to the appellant to make an election whether he would consolidate or not. Your F Lordships did not think it necessary to hear the respondent's counsel on that point, being of opinion that if the appellant had ever possessed the right of election which the agreement assumed, he had made his election, and it was too late to retract it after judgment and decree; that the decree was, in this respect, right at the time when it was made, and could not become erroneous by reason of any subsequent change in the appellant's view of his own interest; and that when such a G decree for consolidation had once been properly made, the parties entitled to redeem, as well as the encumbrancers, had acquired a right of which they ought not to be deprived without their own consent, to any benefit which might result to them from it.

It is not necessary to determine whether under the circumstances of this case the appellant had a right, at or before the hearing, to take at his election such a H decree as was asked for by his notice of motion of May 29, 1880. As at present advised I do not think that he had that right. A suit for redemption must be so constituted in respect of parties and otherwise, and the decree made in it, unless varied by consent of all parties interested, must be such as to enable the court to do complete justice, not only to the plaintiffs and to the encumbrancers whom they seek to redeem, but to all other parties before or behind them whose redemption or foreclosure may be necessary to work out the equities of the case. To split I Merrett's encumbrance as to the £500 and the £250 thereby severed, and to limit the accounts to that part only of the property included therein, of which the plaintiffs were trustees under the settlement of Dec. 3, 1838, as was asked by the notice of May 29, 1880, would seem to be inconsistent with the principles laid down and acted upon in Palk v. Lord Clinton (6) and Thornycroft v. Crockett (7). If the plaintiffs redeemed Merrett's securities, they were entitled also to clear that part of the property included in them which was not included in the settlement from John Tale's second mortgage of Dec. 16, 1836, and if they did this it would seem to follow that they were at the same time entitled to redeem all the property A included in that mortgage to John Tale, among which was the freehold land previously mortgaged to Middleton.

It appears to have been the intention of the lords justices that a decree should be drawn up, according to the ordinary course of the court, for the dismissal of the action if the respondent Jordan should not redeem the appellant's mortgages other than that on the Union Street property, and if he should redeem those B mortgages for subsequent redemption or foreclosure as to the property other than the settled cottages, between Jordan and the respondent Price. With such subsequent redemption or foreclosure JAMES, L.J., said that the appellant would have nothing to do. The decree as actually drawn up provides only for redemption or C dismissal as between Jordan and the appellant. It could not have been drawn up in that form without consent before the registrar by all parties whom he considered interested, to the waiver and omission of all accounts and directions for fore- D closure or redemption as between Jordan and Price. I think your Lordships must assume that those accounts and directions were in fact waived by such mutual consent between Jordan and Price, though it does not so appear on the face of the decree. Whether the appellant consented to or acquiesced in such waiver may be doubtful. In his notice of motion to alter the decree he did not object to it E on this ground, though, if he had a right to do so, the omission of such accounts and consequential directions, necessary according to the ordinary course of the court, would have been an error, not of the court but of the registrar, and might properly have been set right upon a motion of that kind. As, however, JAMES, L.J., considered this to be a matter with which the appellant had nothing to do, I think it was open to him upon the present appeal to object to the decree on that F ground if he could show that he had in fact such an interest as entitled him to make the objection. If he has no such interest, it would not be according to the usual course of your Lordships' House to determine at his instance any question concerning the respondents only, neither of whom has appealed. But I think it right to say that, having regard to the position and character of both the respondents, who represent here absent parties for whom they are respectively trustees, I doubt whether this is a case in which the decree ought to have been drawn up G in the form in which it stands, even by consent, and I shall propose to your Lordships that certain words should be added to it which may prevent it from becoming the occasion of future questions, and possibly of new litigation between these trustees and parties now absent from the record.

The conclusion to which I have come, after consideration, is that the decree as H between the appellant and the respondents is right in form as well as in substance, and that the appellant had no interest in any further accounts or directions which might properly have been added to that decree, and consequently that he has no title or interest now to complain of their omission. The effect of consolidation is to make the consolidated mortgages practically one; and the right of the respondent Jordan, if he pays what is due to the appellant upon the account directed by I the decree, to have a conveyance from the appellant of the whole mortgaged property, is clear. Any question as to the application, as between the different estates included in the consolidated mortgages, of the rents and profits which may be charged against the appellant in taking the account is res inter alios, with which the encumbrancer, after he has been paid off, will have nothing to do. The case is really the same even if it should appear upon the result of the account that nothing at all is due to him. Jordan is still entitled to the benefit of his right of redemption, and, therefore, to a conveyance of the whole property included in the consolidated securities.

As against those who stand behind him and are entitled to redeem from him part of that property he will have a right to charge upon everything which is so redeemable his costs of suit, which may be considerable. Equities of some complexity may arise in such a state of things; but they are equities to which the first encumbrancer, who will have been wholly paid off, must be a stranger. It is a

- A fallacy to suppose that under such circumstances he can in any possible event retain a right to consolidate the Union Street mortgage with the securities which will have been redeemed, against the persons entitled to ulterior equities of redemption. Consolidation can only take place when there are two or more encumbrances at the same time subsisting united in the hands of the same encumbrancer. Baker v. Gray (4), before HALL, V.-C., in which the decree provided for consolidation against one of the defendants, and refused it as against others, was different from the present case.
- B There the right to consolidate was claimed by the mortgagee, who was plaintiff in the suit, against all the defendants. It is clear that in such a case the decree might be, and ought to be, so made as to give the plaintiff what he was entitled to against each defendant. If he should be redeemed by a person against whom he had no right to consolidate, he must, of course, be redeemed without consolidation.
- C But if the person to whom the right of redemption either belonged in the first place, or might afterwards come in default of redemption by those standing before him, was one against whom he had a right to consolidate, then the decree ought to be made accordingly. In the present case the plaintiffs were persons against whom the appellant had no right to consolidate the Union Street mortgage; and if they did not redeem the other property their action would be simply dismissed, and no question as to any posterior right of redemption would arise. If they did redeem, the securities which they redeemed would necessarily, and for ever, pass out of the appellant's hands, and none of them could afterwards be consolidated with the other mortgage which he retained.

- I have now to state my reasons for thinking that the objections to the constitution of the suit which were urged at your Lordships' Bar ought not to prevail. They were four in number. The first and second were in effect that the ultimate equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises was not properly represented upon the record by the respondent Price, who claims it as the trustee of a settlement made by Thomas Tale on May 6, 1868, on the ground that Thomas Tale on Oct. 6, 1845, presented a petition to the Bristol Court of Bankruptcy, under the then Insolvent Debtors Act, and that all his interest in the mortgaged premises thereupon became
- F vested in the official assignee of that court; and that he also executed, on Oct. 9, 1845, an indenture by which, if he had then any equity of redemption in the premises, he conveyed it to John Brend Winterbotham in trust for George Tale, who had previously acquired the title of the mortgagees. The petition presented by Thomas Tale to the Bristol Court of Bankruptcy was produced from the proper custody.
- G On the back of it the word "dismissed" is written in the handwriting of one Turner, who was then an officer of the court. Nothing was ever done upon that petition beyond the initial steps necessarily and always taken in such cases; it plainly died a natural death thirty-three years before the commencement of the present action. Under these circumstances the presumption of fact is in accordance with the endorsement. The equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, if it had for a time become vested in the official assignee, ceased to be so on the dismissal of that petition. This objection to the title of the respondent Price, therefore, fails.
- H As to the deed alleged to have been executed by Thomas Tale on Oct. 9, 1845, it has not been produced, nor has its absence, if it was ever executed, been properly accounted for. The only evidence of its execution consists in certain entries in the books of Messrs. Winterbotham, Bell & Co., solicitors, of Cheltenham, who

- I prepared a draft for that purpose, and had it engrossed. Mr. John Brend Winterbotham, the intended trustee, who was a member of that firm, has made an affidavit in which he states his belief that the intended deed was never executed, nor in any way acted upon. The entries in these books would not be evidence at all apart from the evidence of Mr. Winterbotham, and, if taken in connection with what he says, they certainly do not establish the execution of the deed, the burden of proving which rested upon the appellant. The title, therefore, of the respondent Price is not displaced, either by the petition in insolvency, or by the supposed deed of Oct. 9, 1845.

The next objection was that the cestuis que trust of Price under the settlement of May 6, 1868, ought to have been brought before the court. Having regard, however, to R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 16, r. 7, I think that Price sufficiently represented his cestuis que trust for the purposes of this suit, no direction having been given by the court to the contrary. A

The last objection related to the absence from this record of the assignee in bankruptcy of George Tale, from whom the title of the Gloucestershire Banking Co. was originally derived, who afterwards became bankrupt in February, 1849, before the sale and transfer by the Gloucestershire Banking Co. to William Jennings, the appellant's predecessor in title. The action was commenced more than twenty-seven years after the date of that transfer, and neither in his pleadings, nor before either of the courts below, was any objection made by the appellant to the constitution of the suit on the ground that the assignee in bankruptcy of George Tale had, as between himself and the appellant, a subsisting equity of redemption in respect of which he ought to have been made a defendant. There is no trace of any such point having been argued before the Court of Appeal. The appellant may well be conceived to have had reasons for not taking any such objection. If it had been taken in due time, the plaintiffs might have been able to meet it without difficulty. Whatever might have been its weight if sooner taken, I think it would be against sound principle, and contrary to the practice of your Lordships' House, now to give effect to it. B C D

It only remains for me to add that I would propose to your Lordships that the decree appealed from should be varied by reserving liberty to the respondents, or either of them, or to any of the cestuis que trust, under the deeds of Dec. 3, 1838, and May 6, 1868, respectively, in case of redemption of the mortgaged premises included in the decree by the respondent Jordan, to apply to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice for the addition to the decree of any further accounts and directions consequential thereon which by reason of such redemption the court may think just. I do not consider that this variation in the form of the decree, in which the appellant has no interest, ought to affect the costs of the appeal. I, therefore, move your Lordships that, subject only to that variation, the decree be affirmed; and that the appellant pay the costs of the appeal. E F

LORD BLACKBURN stated the facts, and continued: The Court of Appeal had to determine the question whether the position contended for by the plaintiff in his amended statement of claim, or that contended for by the defendant, truly represents the law of England as administered in the courts of equity. Tassell v. Smith (1)—a decision by two equity lawyers of great experience, KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ., in 1858—was relied upon, and the question for the Court of Appeal was whether this decision was right, or at least was binding upon them. They decided the question in favour of the plaintiff, and the first and most important question brought before the House is whether they were right in that decision. The Court of Appeal had not to inquire whether the defendant had or had not a right to consolidate the earlier mortgages, nor, as I apprehend, is any question on that now before this House. Should it be contended hereafter that the plaintiff's counsel conceded more than he was bound to do, the decision of the Court of Appeal will not stand in his way, though other decisions may. G H

I take it that the only question before this House is whether, where the mortgage on one property is not created till after the equity of redemption in the other property has been parted with, there is, as against the purchaser, an equity to consolidate the two. I do not think it conclusive that the alleged equity was one which, if the matter were res integra, could not be maintained, nor even that it was such as in the name of equity would work injustice. Some of the rules acted on in courts of equity in the kindred subject of tacking securities on the same property are founded upon this, that a mortgage, after the time specified for redemption had expired, was an absolute estate, which no doubt it was at law, and that the equity of redemption was only a personal equity to take away the I

A legal estate from him in whom it was vested, which, perhaps, it originally was. It would seem that now after equitable estates have been treated and dealt with for a very long time as to all other intents estates, any rules founded on the antiquated law ought to be no longer applicable, and that cessante ratione, cessare debet et lex; but some rules apparently founded on this antiquated law have been so uniformly and long acted upon that they must be treated as still binding.

B The rule was first laid down in Marsh v. Lee (8) that if there was a subsequent mortgagee, who, as the legal estate was in another, could only be a mortgagee of the equity of redemption, whose claim being prior in time to that of a third mortgagee would be satisfied before it, yet if the third mortgagee acquired the legal estate, even with full knowledge of the existence of the second mortgage, he should be entitled to squeeze out the second mortgage. In Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough (9) (2 P.Wms. at p. 492) in 1728, SIR JOSEPH JERKILL, M.R., thought that the rule of equity was so settled,

“not, however, without great appearance of hardship; for still it seems reasonable that each mortgagee should be paid according to his priority, and hard to leave a second mortgagee without remedy, who might know when he lent his money that the land was of sufficient value to pay the first mortgage and his own also; to be defeated of a just debt by a matter inter alios acta, a contrivance between the first mortgagee and the third, is great severity.”

Yet notwithstanding these, as it seems to me, unanswerable objections to the rule, he considered it established. In Wortley v. Birkhead (10) LORD HARDWICKE intimates, I think pretty plainly, that, if it were then to be settled for the first time, he would have decided the other way, but that it was settled; and in Titley v. Davies (5), in 1743, he acted upon it. Now, after the lapse of nearly a century and a half more, I think only the legislature can do away with this rule, which however does not apply to this case, which is not the case of tacking or gaining priority for a puisne incumbrance on the same property, but a case of consolidating encumbrances on two different properties.

F But though a rule, even if it works what is not justice, may be established by a long series of decisions to be the rule of equity, yet, when it is alleged that a rule producing such a lamentable result exists in a particular case, the burden of proof lies strongly on those who assert it to show that it is established either by decided cases or by evidence of such a long-continued practice as shows that there are not cases only because the rule has never been disputed. Although I cannot doubt

G that the lords justices thought that the rule on which they acted in Tassell v. Smith (1) was already established; and though it is reasonable to suppose that two judges who had such long and great experience in courts of equity had grounds for so thinking, yet the discussion at your Lordships' Bar convinced me that they made a mistake. The earliest case cited is Pope v. Onslow (11). In Ex parte King (12), before LORD HARDWICKE in 1750, that case was cited as establishing

H that where A. had two mortgages upon different independent estates of the mortgagor, one a deficient security and the other more than sufficient, the mortgagor should not redeem the last without making good the deficiency of the other security; but the Lord Chancellor said that he was not satisfied that this was the established rule of the court. Both HALL, V.-C., in Baker v. Gray (4) and COTTON, L.J., in the present case, say that LORD HARDWICKE afterwards changed his opinion. I

I suppose they are right, though I have not been able to discover the case in which he said so. I have read Titley v. Davies (5) with attention, and it appears to me that LORD HARDWICKE there thought that Titley, having an equitable mortgage on one portion of property mortgaged to Shephard, had a right, as against Shephard and all who claimed under him, to redeem the whole property; and that then, having done so, Titley, who had the legal estate in the whole, had got a right, as against both Shephard and those who claimed under him, to retain the whole till his equitable mortgage, though only on a part, was paid off. This, like Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough (9), may be unquestionable equity, though, to say the least, questionable justice; but, as it seems to me, it has nothing to do with consolidation, and indeed Ex parte King (12) was subsequent in date to Titley v. Davies (5). A

It is not, however, I think, important whether LORD HARDWICKE changed his opinion or not, if, as I think is the case, the rule as far as laid down in Pope v. Onslow (11) has since that time been recognised as the settled rule in equity. In Willie v. Lugg (13) in 1761, LORD NORTHINGTON, L.C., said that the principle upon which the court proceeds continued as long as the equity of redemption remains united, but, he said (2 Eden, at p. 80), B

"There seems to be also a manifest distinction between this case and the case of a purchase subject to a mortgage, for there the purchaser acquires a right to redeem that particular mortgage, and when he comes to redeem he offers to equity pay off all that his estate is a debtor for." C

Certainly he was not of opinion that the equity subsequently laid down in Tassell v. Smith (1) then existed. In Jones v. Smith (14), in 1794, SIR PEPPER ARDEN, M.R. (later LORD ALVANLEY) says (2 Ves. at pp. 376, 377):

"Pope v. Onslow (11) followed by two modern cases, has settled the point that as against the mortgagor or his assignee, and, therefore, I must suppose against all the creditors, if there are two legal mortgages which at law are become absolute, for that must be the principle, the mortgagee shall insist on being redeemed as to both or neither." D

The "two modern cases," which he cites from the registrar's book are Cator v. Charlton (15), June 21, 1775, decided, I suppose, by LORD BATHURST, and Collet v. Munden (16), in 1786, decided by LORD KENYON on the authority of the first. In Cator v. Charlton (15) the different mortgages were all made while the mortgagor was owner of the equity of redemption of the whole; and it was insisted that the plaintiff, who afterwards purchased the equity of redemption, had at the time of his purchase notice of the other mortgages. E

In Ireson v. Denn (17), in 1796, LORD ALVANLEY is reported to have said (2 Cox, Eq. Cas. at pp. 425, 426): F

"He did not know why such a rule was ever laid down, but it had been decided by many cases that a mortgagee of two distinct estates upon distinct transactions from the same mortgagor was entitled to hold both, even as against the purchaser of the equity of redemption of one of the mortgaged estates without notice of the other mortgage until the payment of the whole money due on both mortgages." G

But the case before him, like the cases which he mentions in Jones v. Smith (14), was a case of two mortgages made to the same person while the equity of redemption belonged to the same person, who afterwards assigned the equity of redemption in one of the estates. Even if it was established that in such a case the right to consolidate would be good against the assignee, it does not seem to me to follow that it would be good against an assignee of the equity of redemption in one of the estates made while the two mortgages were not yet vested in the same person, still less as against one made before the mortgage of the other estate existed. H

The next reported decision is that of White v. Hillacre (3), before ALDERSON, B., sitting in equity. The facts, as stated in the judgment, were that James Hillacre mortgaged M., and died leaving the equity of redemption to Thomas Hillacre in fee; at that time the mortgage was vested in Clark, and so continued till after Thomas Hillacre's death. Thomas, who was owner in fee of W., mortgaged it to Clitsome in 1812, and at his death in 1815 devised M. to one set of devisees and W. to another. ALDERSON, B., said (3 Y. & C.Ex. at p. 608): I

"This being the state of facts, Clark in 1816 assigns to Clitsome the mortgage on M., and then for the first time the mortgages are united in one person. I am of opinion that the plaintiff has no right to tack under these circumstances.

- A The right seems to have been established upon this principle, that where a mortgagee is in possession of the legal estate in two properties as a security for money lent on them, a court of equity will not allow the person entitled to the equity of redemption to redeem either unless he redeem both, and allows the mortgagee a lien on the whole for his whole debt. But this principle manifestly cannot apply to a case where the equity of redemption belongs to different persons. Here that is so; and these persons, though volunteers, as it is said, became entitled under Thomas Hillacre's will before the assignment of the mortgage on M. was made to Clitsome."
- B

Notwithstanding the observations of WOOD, V.-C., in Beevor v. Luck (2), I must own that the judgment of ALDERSON, B., has at least an appearance of good sense, and of furthering justice or perhaps I should say of refusing to further injustice, that, to my mind, is very persuasive. It is not, however, necessary in the present case to form any opinion on this point.

- C White v. Hillacre (3) was not cited in Tassell v. Smith (1), which is to be lamented, for if it had been the lords justices would have, no doubt, explained why and how it was just that the purchaser of the equity of redemption of Blackacre should be under any obligation to fulfil the equities which his vendor had, after the sale, become liable to fulfil in respect of Whiteacre, with which the purchaser of the equity of redemption of Blackacre never had anything to do, for this does not, I think, evidently follow, even if it was settled that, if the two mortgages had been united before the sale of the equity of redemption so that the vendor was then liable to fulfil them, that equity should prevail; and if, as is very likely, they had said that the objections to them were not stronger than those against tacking stated in Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough (9), but that long-settled rules ought not to be departed from, they would have had to consider whether there was any settled rule, or indeed any decision at all that the purchaser of Blackacre was under any obligation to fulfil an equity of his vendor in respect of a debt first incurred after the sale of Blackacre and secured on Whiteacre, which might not even have been the property of the vendor at the time of the sale of the equity of redemption. All that appears by the report to have been said by TURNER, L.J., is, that
- E
- F

"one who comes to redeem a security cannot do so without redeeming any other security which the defendant holds upon property of his."

- He does not notice that the estate which the vendor pledged after he had sold the equity of redemption could in no natural sense of the words be called the property of the purchaser, and he cites no authority to show that an artificial rule was established by which it was to be treated as his.
- G

- HALL, V.-C., in Baker v. Gray (4) searched for such an authority and found none. The lords justices in the present case could find none. The experienced counsel who argued for the appellant at your Lordships' Bar could find none but those on which I have already commented; and of those it seems to me that what is said by LORD ALVANLEY in Ireson v. Denn (17) is the only authority prior to Tassell v. Smith (1) that has any bearing on the case, and that, I think, does not go so far as is required. I think that the doctrine of consolidation of mortgages ought not to be carried farther than it has been, and that Tassell v. Smith (1) did, at least as far as regards a mortgage made on another property after the equity of redemption in the first mortgage had been parted with, carry it further than ever had been done before, and should not be followed. The decree was made as it was asked for by the defendant, and not objected to by the plaintiff, consolidating the mortgages prior to the settlement of 1888. After it had been drawn up as the parties asked, and as the court meant it to be, the defendant found reason to fear that he had, under the belief that it was for his benefit, asked for a consolidation which it would have been more prudent for him not to ask for, and he sought to set aside the whole proceedings, and make the plaintiff redeem only Merrett's mortgage, as the plaintiff originally asked, not on the ground that there had been any mistake on the part of either himself or the court, but because he feared he had been injudicious. I think he should have thought of all this before, and that the Court of Appeal properly rejected his application. A

There remains only the question whether the order to carry out the decree of the Court of Appeal requires amendment. The appellant has not, I think, anything of which to complain. The order as it stands does not subject him to anything to which he ought not to be liable, or deprive him of anything to which he is entitled. But as it is possible, though I think not probable, that the state of the accounts may turn out to be such that those who are beneficially interested in the equities of redemption of the different properties may require some further protection, I agree that the order should be varied as proposed. I entirely agree that this variation should make no difference in the costs. B

LORD WATSON concurred.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING CO. v. RATCLIFFE E

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Selborne, L.C., Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson), May 19, 20, 23, June 14, 1881]

[Reported 6 App. Cas. 722; 51 L.J.Ch. 28; 45 L.T. 322;
30 W.R. 109] F

Money—Payment on account—Appropriation—Payments into banking account—Banker's lien extending over whole account.

Mortgage—Bank overdraft—Security—Deposit of deeds—Sale of property by mortgagor—Account overdrawn at time of contract—Before conclusion of sale payments in greater than amount of overdraft—Further advances continuing overdraft—Right of banker to charge on estate as against purchaser. G

The rule in Clayton's Case (1) (1816), 1 Mer. 572, applies to payments into a banking account, notwithstanding that the banker's lien extends over the whole account.

B. deposited the title deeds of real estate in the hands of the appellants, with a written memorandum, to secure the then present and future general balance of his account with them. He afterwards sold a part of the real estate to the respondent. At the time of the contract of sale his account with the appellants was overdrawn. The appellants had notice of the sale to the respondent, and the respondent had constructive notice of the appellants' charge. Before the payment of the final instalment of the purchase money B. paid to the appellants sums amounting in the aggregate to more than the amount of his debt to them at the date of the sale, but they had made further advances to him after that date, and the whole balance of the account was never turned in his favour. H

Held: the respondent was not liable for such further advances as a charge on the estate. I

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

F June 14, 1881. The following opinions were read.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—The appellants in this case claim under an equitable mortgage of certain real estate at Earley, near Reading, given to them by one of their customers, named Batten, to secure the then present and future general balance of his banking account with them. The conveyance of that estate to him from a vendor named Spokes was deposited by Batten with the bank, the purpose
G of the deposit being declared by a memorandum in writing, dated Jan. 17, 1873, by which Batten engaged to give the bank, whenever required, legal mortgages of this property, and, as I collect, of other properties, the deeds or documents relating to which were also at the same time deposited, and declared that the security should not be considered satisfied by the payment or liquidation of any sums to be thereafter from time to time due on the balance of the account, but should
H extend to cover all future sums which should at any time be or become due. This memorandum was afterwards cancelled, and another security in the same terms, except the date and an unimportant variance in the description of part of the property, was signed in lieu of it, and was given by Batten to the bank on June 19, 1874. One of the questions in the case might be whether this cancellation and substitution of 1874 did not put an end to the security of 1873, under
I which alone the appellants would be entitled to make any claim against the respondent. But I prefer to consider the case upon its merits, as if no such cancellation or substitution had taken place.

On April 28, 1873, an agreement in writing was signed by Batten and the respondent, his brother-in-law, for the sale by Batten to the respondent of part of the real estate at Earley comprised in the conveyance deposited with the bank. The purchase money, £3,200, was treated as divisible into three sums—£1,500 for one part called "Canterbury Villas," £900 for another part called "Woodbine Villas," and £800 for the remaining part called "Twyford Villas." A deposit of £25 was paid, and May 24, 1873, was fixed for payment of the rest of the purchase money, and for conveyance and completion of the purchase, possession to be given to the purchaser as from that date. Batten agreed in the ordinary way to make a good title, which would, of course, be a title free from incumbrances, and he was to retain all deeds and documents in his possession relating to any property other than that sold to the respondent, covenanting in the usual way for their production. The effect of this last stipulation was that the respondent, as purchaser, could not claim possession of the deed of conveyance from Spokes, which had been deposited with the bank, and related to other property as well as to that sold to him. In addition to the terms embodied in this agreement of April 28, 1873, it was stipulated between Batten and the respondent, by letters, that two debts then due from Batten to the respondent and his wife for sums exceeding together £800 should be set off against the purchase money of £3,200. A B C

The appellants and the respondent had respectively notice, the former of the contract of sale from Batten to the respondent; the latter of the appellants' security of Jan. 17, 1873. The contract and the notice of it to the appellants were, or may for the present purpose be treated as having been, contemporaneous. The amount then due to the appellants on the balance of their banking account with Batten was £1,779 6s. 7d., and of this the respondent must be deemed to have had notice. The contract, so far as relates to Canterbury Villas, was completed by conveyance, and payment of the £1,500 apportioned to that part of the property on May 28, 1873, with the knowledge of the appellants, who received £1,100, part of this £1,500, on June 6 from Batten's solicitor, the remaining £400 being received, without objection from the appellants, by Batten himself. Another conveyance in fee simple of all the rest of the property agreed to be sold was at the same time executed, and was left with Batten's solicitor until the rest of the purchase money should have been paid, as it eventually was in several instalments by the respondent to Batten. The latest of these payments was made on Mar. 25, 1876, after which the conveyance from Batten was delivered up to the respondent. The appellants had no notice of the execution of this conveyance, or of any of the payments made by the respondent to Batten in respect of the property comprised in it, until some time after the last payment. D E F

Under these circumstances it results from the decision of your Lordships' house in Hopkinson v. Rolt (2) that, as against the title of the respondent, the purchaser under the contract of April 28, 1873, no further charge on the real estate comprised in that contract could be created in addition to the balance of £1,779 6s. 7d. at that time due, by any subsequent advances which the bank might make to Batten. Nor can I discover anything in the nature or terms of the appellants' security of Jan. 17, 1873, to prevent the extinction of that debt due on April 28, 1873, by means of payments afterwards made by Batten to the general credit of his banking account upon the principle of Clayton's Case (1) (1 Mer. at p. 585). In point of fact those payments were, before the end of the same year 1873, more than sufficient to extinguish the whole of that debt; and although in the continuation of the account there was always a considerable balance due to the bank, the whole debt subsequent to 1873 was for advances later than April 28, 1873. The continued possession by the appellants of the deed of conveyance from Spokes to Batten, relating as it did to other property besides that sold to the respondent, makes, in my opinion, no difference in the case. G H

Upon the statement of claim in the action the appellants' case appears to me to be rested on grounds inconsistent with the decision in Hopkinson v. Rolt (2). But a different view was presented in the argument at your Lordships' Bar, which it is now necessary to consider, assuming it to be open to the appellants notwithstanding the form of their pleading. It was contended that the security of Jan. 17, 1873, extended to every interest which Batten, the mortgagor, had, or at any time during its continuance might have, in any part of the land to which the deposited deed of conveyance related; that, although by the contract of sale it necessarily became limited as to the land itself to the debt of £1,779 6s. 7d. I

A then due, which was afterwards paid off, it continued operative against the purchase money payable under that contract to Batten so as to bind that purchase money, except the £400 paid with the appellants' knowledge, by all the subsequent advances from time to time made; that the respondent was bound to inquire whether there were or were not any such subsequent advances before he could be discharged from any part of the purchase money by any payment to Batten; and that, having failed to make such inquiry, he is now liable to pay the money over again to the appellants to the full extent to which advances were actually made. The result of the appellants' contention is to ascribe to the contract for sale of April 28, 1873, with the notice which they had of it, the effect of dividing what was before a single mortgage security operating upon one subject and for one debt, into two distinct securities operating upon different subjects, upon one for a present debt, and upon the other for a merely possible future liability. The original security was the land, the debt secured was such balance as might happen to be due whenever the security should be put in force. But after April 28, 1873, the real estate, according to this argument, continued to be a security only for the amount then due, and at the same time the personal debt from the respondent to the mortgagor, which had then for the first time come into existence, and the vendor's lien for that debt, became a security for all those future advances by which the real estate could be no longer bound.

I agree with the lords justices in thinking that any such prospective division of the security, any such mortgage of a subject not then in existence for further advances which the appellants were under no obligation to make, was not within the contemplation of the parties to the memorandum of Jan. 17, 1873, nor really within the scope of that instrument. When the mortgagor exercised, with notice to the mortgagee, the right which according to Hopkinson v. Rolt (2), he undoubtedly possessed of selling the mortgaged estate subject to the then existing charge of the bank, and making his own bargain with the purchaser on his own terms and in his own way without any concurrence of the bank, a line was in my opinion drawn, which was applicable to the security as a whole, and the bank could not make further advances so as to prevent or intercept, without any new agreement with Batten, or any notice to the respondent beyond that which he had of the original security, the fulfilment in the ordinary course of the terms of the contract between Batten as vendor and the respondent as purchaser. If the respondent had bought a mere equity of redemption subject to the appellants' charge, and had paid off that charge, it seems to me quite impossible to contend that he would not have been at liberty to pay the balance of the purchase money to his vendor without making any inquiry as to subsequent advances by the appellants. If it were otherwise, he could not be entitled without the appellants' consent to stipulate, as he did, that the pre-existing debts due to himself and his wife from Batten should be set off against the purchase money.

It makes, in my judgment, no difference that by the terms of the contract it was Batten's duty, as between himself and the respondent, to clear the estate sold from the appellants' incumbrance. In point of fact he did so, and indeed he did more. The sums paid by him from time to time into the bank after the date of the contract exceeded the whole amount of the purchase money received by him from first to last from the respondent. This would, no doubt, be immaterial to the present controversy if the appellants had the rights which they claim; for they received those moneys, except the £1,100 paid on June 6, 1873, from Batten, without knowing from what source they came. But from the terms of the respondent's contract, of which the bank had notice, the fair and reasonable inference was that the settlement of the purchase money was intended to, and would, take place according to the ordinary course between vendor and purchaser—i.e., by payment to the vendor subject to his obligations to clear the title from the then existing charge. Notice to the respondent of the security of Jan. 17, 1873, was notice of the existing charge, but it was not notice that, after the amount of that charge had been fixed once for all as against the land by the sale of the estate, further advances, which the appellants were under no contract or obligation to make, would voluntarily be made by them to Batten, much less that such advances would be made upon the footing of an equitable assignment to the bank of the unpaid purchase money. Until these advances were actually made there was not, and there could not be, any existing charge for them, and even if such a charge arose as between Batten and the bank when they were in fact made, this was not a charge of which notice by anticipation can be imputed to the respondent, or into the existence or non-existence of which he was bound to inquire. It was for the appellants, when those facts happened which in their view resulted in such a charge, to give notice of it. A

A question not dissimilar to this arose and was decided by this House in Shaw v. Foster (3). There Pooley had contracted with Foster to purchase certain real estate, and had afterwards given a security by depositing the contract and an accompanying memorandum with the Birmingham Banking Co. The memorandum contained, among other things, a stipulation that he would, on request, assign to them his contract with Foster. Of this security, and of the fact that it was regarded by the bank as a charge upon the property, Foster had express notice, but it was held by the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and by this House, that, not having notice that the bank had made the necessary request to Pooley on which the assignment of the contract by way of security was made contingent by the terms of the memorandum, he was under no obligation to make any inquiry on that subject, though he would have learned, if he had done so, that the request had in fact been made, and that he was at liberty to convey the estate to Pooley without communicating with the bank, when the time for completion arrived. The principle of that decision seems to me to be applicable to the present case. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment under appeal is right, and ought to be affirmed; and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs. B C D E

LORD BLACKBURN stated the facts, and continued: The bank were given distinct notice that the agreement of April 28, 1873, was signed, which was the fact. The bank were not given any notice that it was part of the bargain that £824 11s. was to be paid by way of set-off, and that Batten's vendor's lien was only good for the balance, or a little less than £2,400, which, however, was more than enough to discharge all that was then due to the bank. Even if those acting for the bank had seen the agreement, they would not have found any stipulation as to how the price was to be paid. I think it most likely that Batten had led the bank to believe that the whole £3,200 was to be paid in cash, and would pass through his hands; and it is not unlikely that his solicitor, Graham, was not at all anxious to disabuse them of an expectation that must have tended to make them more liberal to Batten; but I see nothing to show that Ratcliffe at any time, or Graham while acting as Ratcliffe's solicitor, did anything to foster this belief. The bank asked no questions, and I think they had no right to assume that the price was not to be paid in any way which Batten and Ratcliffe might find most convenient. But Ratcliffe had notice, through his solicitor, that the deeds were pledged, as is universally the case with deposits with banks, not only for its existing balance, which on May 2, 1873, appears from the pass book to have been between £1,700 and £1,800, but also for the general balance that might at any time become due, which might be very much larger. F G H

The question arises: What was the effect of this last notice? The further facts necessary to raise it are briefly these. Graham procured some one to take a mortgage of the Canterbury Villas for £1,100, and I suppose had in some way or other informed the bank that he had done so, and that this £1,100 would be forthcoming. From that time the Canterbury Villas estate is out of the case; and by this payment of £1,100 the balance which was owing to the bank on May 2, 1873, was reduced to between £600 and £700. I do not think that anything is proved which amounted to notice, either actual or constructive, to Ratcliffe, or to Graham when acting as his solicitor, after that date, May 2, 1873: I

A but in fact the bank continued their account with Batten, receiving payments from him and making advances to him just as they might have done if there had been no notice of the sale to Ratcliffe. The balance of the account was never turned in Batten's favour. It is struck in the pass book at the end of each three months, and it is obvious from the figures that if what is called "the rule in Clayton's Case (1)" is to be applied, the old balance due on July 1, 1873, was wholly paid off during the two quarters ending on Dec. 31 and that the balance due on Jan. 1, 1874, consisted entirely of advances made after June 30, 1873, which was some time after the bank had notice of the sale.

B Ratcliffe paid to Batten at various times moneys, and gave him credit, which, on the whole amounted to £3,200, the last of these payments being on Mar. 25, 1876. He made these various payments without any inquiry whether Batten had paid off the charge the bank had on the property, which was not imprudent on his part, as he did not personally know that such charges existed, Batten and Graham not having informed him of that fact. But it is not, and could not be, disputed that, notice having been given to Graham while acting as his solicitor that the charge to this amount existed at the time when notice of his purchase was given on his behalf to the bank, no subsequent payments to Batten could avail against that charge. He must show that the amount was paid to the bank. £1,100 was in every sense paid to the bank on June 6, 1873. The balance of between £600 and £700 is only accounted for if the rule in Clayton's Case (1) applies. BACON, V.-C., thought it did not. He says (51 L.J.Ch. at p. 30) :

E "In my opinion no such principle is applicable to the case of deposit made with a banker. It has no application, because, as has been truly said, a banker's lien upon all matters deposited with him, or which come into his possession, extends over the whole of the account. When the relation of debtor and creditor subsists between the parties the lien is operative and active."

F The lords justices were of a different opinion. JAMES, L.J., briefly says (ibid. at p. 35) : "It is clear from the bank accounts that all that was due at that time was long since paid off."

I agree with the lords justices. I think that BACON, V.-C., is quite right in saying that, as between the banker and the customer, the lien is operative whenever the relation of debtor and creditor exists. If the payments made to the bank had been at any time so great as to turn the balance in favour of Batten, so that his account had been a solvent one, and afterwards advances had been made by the bank so great as to turn the balance the other way, it would be quite accurate to say that the lien for this new balance, as between the bank and Batten, was as effective as if the balance had never been turned; but could it then be contended that the old balance had not been discharged, or that, though Ratcliffe never had been told that the balance had for a time been turned, his property could have been held liable to make good part of the new balance because it had been subject to a charge for that which was paid off? I take it such a contention would have been obviously untenable. And I do not see why the discharge by the application of the rule in Clayton's Case (1) should have less effect. The bank might, if they pleased, have taken the payments on such terms as to prevent the application of the rule, but, they not having done so, it seems to me that the old balance I was paid off before the end of the year 1873.

But this leaves the question to be determined whether, as against the purchaser Ratcliffe, he having had notice—though I think only constructive notice—that the title deeds had been pledged to the bank on the usual terms—that they should be a security for all moneys which should at any time be due upon general balance—the bank had a security on the property after it had become Ratcliffe's for advances made in the ordinary way, but after they had notice that the property had become Ratcliffe's. BACON, V.-C., by his decree, makes Ratcliffe a trustee of all these sums. I do not think that in his judgment he clearly indicates why he so thought, but I conjecture that he recollected what was at one time believed by many practitioners to have been the law settled by Gordon v. Grakam (4), and thought it applied to this case, and that it was not brought to his notice that a majority of this House had, in Hopkinson v. Rolt (2), determined that, contrary to the opinion of LORD CRANWORTH, who dissented, Gordon v. Graham (4) had been misunderstood, and that a mortgage to secure future advances not exceeding a certain amount, though perfectly good as against the mortgagor, gave him no equity to postpone advances made by a second mortgagee with notice of the first to advances made by the first mortgagee after notice of the second mortgage. I do not inquire whether, if the doctrine for which LORD CRANWORTH contended had been adopted by the House, and was the law as to advances made by a second mortgagee, it would have applied to payments by a purchaser—I doubt it; but, it being decided by this House that it was not law as to a second mortgagee, it follows, a multo fortiori, that it is not law as to a purchaser. In this I agree with the lords justices.

One more point was made at your Lordships' Bar, which I think was not suggested before the lords justices, and at all events was not dealt with by them. It was said that Batten, not having been paid the full price when he sold, still held the land as an unpaid vendor, with an unpaid vendor's lien against Ratcliffe for this unpaid amount. The sum could be afterwards ascertained, but it certainly was considerable; and Batten could pledge this unpaid vendor's lien to the bank, and if he did so, and notice was given to the purchaser of such a pledge, the purchaser could no longer safely pay Batten, who could not give him a discharge without the concurrence of the pledgee. In all this I agree. It was further argued that the deeds having been deposited with the bank as a security for future advances, that did, ipso facto, pledge as a security for those future advances his interest as an unpaid vendor which arose on the sale; and that Ratcliffe, having constructive notice of the terms of the deposit, was in the same position exactly as if he had actual notice that Batten had agreed to pledge his unpaid vendor's lien for future advances, and in paying Batten took the risk, not only of whether the previous advances had been paid off, but also of whether there had been any subsequent advances. This, in effect, raises the question whether anyone purchasing land, with notice that the title deeds have been deposited with a bank, is bound to inquire whether the bank has, after receiving notice of the purchase, made fresh advances on the security of the unpaid vendor's lien, or whether the burden does not lie on the bank advancing on the security of the unpaid vendor's lien to give notice to the purchaser that it has so done, or intends so to do. No case was cited in which any such point had been discussed, but I think that both convenience and principle strongly point to the burden of giving notice lying on the bank, and not on the purchaser, whose inquiries might often be annoying and impertinent. I am, therefore, of opinion, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Insurance—Subrogation—Fire—Sale of insured premises—Damage by fire after contract, but before completion—Insurance money and full purchase money received by assured—Right of insurers to recover.

After the date of a contract for the sale of a house which had been insured by the vendors against fire and before completion of the purchase the house was damaged by fire, and the insurance company, in ignorance of the contract, paid the vendors for the damage. The purchase was subsequently completed, the vendors receiving the full amount of the purchase money, and also retaining the moneys paid to them by the insurance company. In an action by the insurance company to recover the amount paid to the vendors,

Held: the contract of insurance was a contract of indemnity only, and, therefore, the receipt of the purchase money by the vendors must be taken into account in calculating the amount of the loss sustained by them, and, as it had the effect of extinguishing the loss, the company was entitled to recover.

Kernochan v. New York Bowery Fire Insurance Co., 2 Duer (N.Y.) 1; affirmed, 17 N.Y. 428.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of CHITTY, J., in favour of the defendants, reported 8 Q.B.D. 613.

On July 31, 1878, the defendants entered into a contract with Messrs. Rayner for the sale to them of a house and premises in Liverpool for the sum of £3,100. At the date of the contract the house was insured against fire by the defendants with the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., but no mention of the insurance was made in the contract. After the date of the contract, but before the completion of the purchase, the house was damaged by fire to the extent of £330, which sum was paid to the defendants by the insurance company, who at that time were not aware of the contract for the sale of the premises. As the defendants refused to hand over the £330 to the purchasers, or allow it to be deducted from the purchase money, or to expend it in reinstating the premises, the purchasers brought an action against the vendors for a declaration that they were entitled to
